PREFACE TO THE SEVENTEENTH EDITION

THIS edition has been thoroughly revised and the commentary on some of the sections has been re-cast in the light of fresh decisions. Nearly five hundred new cases have been incorporated in the comments. Owing to the force of circumstances—viz. tremendous rise in the cost of printing paper and high charges of printing—the price of this edition has been unavoidably increased.

All amendments to the Code have been noted, and case-law has been scrupulously brought down to date.

October, 1948.

EXTRACTS FROM THE PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION

THE commentary under each section is divided into three Parts: first comes Comment; secondly, Cases; and thirdly, matter pertaining to Practice.

AS to COMMENT.—The object of a section as foreshadowed in the Notes of the authors of the Code, or in the two Reports of the Indian Law Commissioners, or in the Proceedings of the Legislative Council, has been fully stated. Wherever the scope of a section has been the subject of judicial criticism it has been carefully explained. Wherever the meaning or principle of a section is elucidated in a judicial pronouncement excerpts from it have been given. Every judicial interpretation or construction of a word, phrase or clause, has been given, as much as possible, in the ipsissima verba of Judges. For facility of reference, the words, expressions and clauses commented upon are capped with figures in the text and are repeated in the Comment as sub-headings with corresponding numbers.

AS to CASES.—The cases bearing on each section have been arranged into cognate groups, each group illustrating some clause.

AS to PRACTICE.—This part is sub-divided into two main headings: first comes Evidence; and, secondly, Procedure.

Under Evidence all points necessary for the prosecution to prove, in order to bring a charge home to the accused, are categorically stated; and questions relating to onus, mode of proof, and admissibility or non-admissibility of evidence are discussed.

Under Procedure fall the contents of the second schedule of the Code of Criminal Procedure; questions concerning Jurisdiction, Sanction, and measure of Punishment; references to Criminal Circulars issued for the guidance of subordinate Judiciary and Magistracy by all the High Courts, Chief Court, and Judicial Commissioners' Courts; and, lastly, forms of Charges for various offences.

EXTRACT FROM THE PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION

All Indian decisions, whether reported in the official or non-official series of law reports, have been incorporated in this work. Mr. Justice West observed in the Full Bench case of Empress v. Moorga Chetty (5 Bom. 338, 362) that "the framers of the Indian Penal Code regarding the English System as 'artificial', 'complicated', 'framed without the slightest reference to India', and very 'defective' declined to make it more than any local system the groundwork of the Code. Cases decided in England, therefore, must be received in India with a careful allowance for the great difference of the law in the two countries". The authors have, therefore, considered it unsafe to burden the Comment with English precedents where the Code differs from the criminal law of England. Such a course, instead of lightening the labours of those who seek for a clear interpretation of the provisions of the Code, merely creates unavoidable pitfalls. English cases have been, however, copiously referred to where the English criminal law is on all fours with the Indian Penal Code.

THE LAW OF CRIMES

THE INDIAN PENAL CODE (ACT XLV OF 1860).

[Received the assent of the Governor-General on October 6, 1860.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.

Preamble. WHEREAS it is expedient to provide a general Penal Code for British India; It is enacted as follows:—

Title and extent of operation of the Code. 1. This Act shall be called the Indian Penal Code, and shall take effect throughout British India.¹

COMMENT.

The Indian Penal Code was drafted by the first Indian Law Commission of which Mr. (afterwards Lord) Macaulay was the President and Macleod, Anderson and Millet were the Commissioners. They drew not only upon English and Indian laws and regulations but also upon Livingstone's Louisiana Code and the Code Napoleon. The draft Code was submitted to the Governor-General of India in Council in 1837. It underwent further revision at the hands of Sir Barnes Peacock, Sir J. W. Colville and several others, and it was completed in 1850. It was presented to the Legislative Council in 1856 and was passed on October 6, 1860.

Under the Mogul rule the Mahomedan law was used in the administration of criminal justice to the exclusion of Hindu law. The Quran was the repository of both civil and criminal law. In interpreting the words of the Quran the Kazis (Judges) turned to the decisions of pious Muslim kings and eminent Muslim jurists of the past.

Prior to 1860, the English criminal law, as modified by several Acts, was administered in the Presidency-towns of Bombay, Calcutta and Madras.¹ In the mofussil the Courts were principally guided by the Mahomedan criminal law, the glaring defects of which were partly removed by Regulations of the Local Governments. In 1827, the system of administration of justice in the Presidency of Bombay was thoroughly revised and from that time the law which the criminal Courts administered was set forth in a Regulation.² But in the other two sister Presidencies the Mahomedan criminal law was in force till the Indian Penal Code came into operation.

The criminal law of India has been codified in the Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code; the former Code deals specifically with offences and states what matters will afford an excuse or a defence to a charge of any offence, and the Court is not entitled to invoke the common law of England in such matters at all.³ The Penal Code is the substantive law and the Criminal Procedure Code, the adjective law. Section 5 of the latter Code says : "All offences under the Indian Penal Code shall be investigated, inquired into, tried and otherwise dealt with according to the provisions hereinafter contained."

Title.—The title of an Act is undoubtedly part of the Act itself, and it is legitimate to use it for the purpose of interpreting the Act as a whole and ascertaining its scope. The title is given to the Act solely for the purpose of facility of reference. It is a statutory nickname to obviate the necessity of always referring to the Act under its full and descriptive title. It is not legitimate to use it for the purpose of ascertaining the scope of the Act. Its object is identification and not description.⁴ It has been held that you cannot resort to the title of an Act for the purpose of construing its provisions. Still, as was said by a very sound and careful Judge, "The title of an Act of Parliament is no part of the law, but it may tend to shew the object of the Legislature"⁵, and Chitty, J.,⁶ observed that the title of an Act may be referred to for the purpose of ascertaining generally the scope of the Act.⁷ The title of a statute does not go for much in construing it; but it is not to be absolutely disregarded.⁸

Preamble.—The preamble shows that the Code was intended to be a general Penal Code for British India, but it contains no specific repeal of the penal laws then in force. This was intentional, as it was considered possible that some offences might have been omitted which it would not be intended to exempt from penal consequences.⁹

The preamble of an Act sets forth the reason for the particular Act of the Legislature and foreshadows what is intended to be effected by the Act. It is a key to open the minds of the framers of the Act. It may be referred to for the purpose of clearing up any ambiguity,¹⁰ or to fix the meaning of words which may have more than one, or to keep the effect of the act within its real scope whenever the enacting part is in any of these respects open to doubt.^{10(a)} It is to the preamble, more especially, that we are to look for the reason, or spirit, of every statute; rehearsing this as it ordinarily does; the evils sought to be remedied, or the doubts purported to be removed by the statute, and so evidencing, in the best and most satisfactory manner, the object or intention of the legislature, in making, and passing, the statute itself.¹¹ But a preamble cannot cut down the meaning of an enactment.¹² It cannot be made use of to control the enactments themselves where they are expressed in clear and unambiguous terms. But the preamble is a key to the statute, and affords a clue to the scope of the statute when the words construed by themselves without the aid of the preamble are fairly capable of more than one meaning.¹³ The preamble cannot restrict or extend the enacting part when the language and scope of the Act are not open to doubt.^{13(a)}

The preamble is omitted from the Code, so far as Burma, by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937. Throughout the Code, unless otherwise provided, for "British India" "British Burma" is substituted by the same Order.

Date of operation of the Code.—The Indian Penal Code came into operation on the 1st day of January 1862. Originally it was to take effect on the 1st day of May 1861, but this date was subsequently changed¹⁴ as it was thought it would not be right to allow the Code, which altered the whole criminal law of the country, to take effect before it was translated and published for the information of the people, and before the Indian Judges and officers had ample time thoroughly to understand it.

¹⁴ Act VI of 1861 changed the date.

Offences committed prior to the operation of the Code.—Such offences are still punishable under the old Acts and Regulations.¹⁵

The Penal Code has been applied to offences committed before its operation in the Punjab by the Punjab Laws Act (IV of 1872), s. 39, and in Ajmer-Merwara by the Ajmer Laws Regulation (III of 1877), s. 29.

1. 'British India.'—These words were substituted for "the whole of the territories which are or may become vested in Her Majesty by the Statute 21 & 22 Vic., c. 106" by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. According to the General Clauses Act¹⁶, 'British India' shall mean all territories and places within His Majesty's dominions which are for the time being governed by His Majesty through the Governor-General of India or through any Governor or other officer subordinate to the Governor-General of India. Thus the Penal Code does not extend to the Indian States and to the tributary Mehals of Mohurbhun¹⁷ and Kheonjur.¹⁸

Section 1 of 21 & 22 Vic., c. 106, which has been repealed by the Government of India Act, 1915 (5 & 6 Geo. V, c. 61), enacted: "The Government of territories now in the possession or under the Government of the East India Company, and all powers in relation to Government vested in or exercised by the said Company, in trust for Her Majesty, shall cease to be vested in or exercised by the said Company, and all territories in the possession or under the Government of the said Company, and all rights vested in or which if this Act had not been passed might have been exercised by the said Company in relation to any territories, shall become vested in Her Majesty, and be exercised in Her name; and for the purposes of this Act India shall mean the territories vested in Her Majesty as aforesaid, and all territories which may become vested in Her Majesty by virtue of any such rights as aforesaid."

The Code has been extended to outlying parts of British India (a) by notification under the Scheduled Districts Act, 1874, and (b) by Regulations under 33 & 34 Vic., c. 3.¹⁹

Amendment.—After the word “effect” there were the words “on and from the first day of January, 1862”; and the section ended with the words “except the Settlement of Prince of Wales’ Island, Singapore, and Malacca.” These words were omitted by the Repealing and Amending Act (XII of 1891), Sch. I.

After the word “throughout” there were the words “the whole of the territories which are or may become vested in Her Majesty by the Statute 21 & 22 Victoria, Chapter 106, entitled ‘An act for the better government of India’”. These words were omitted and the words “British India” were substituted by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. In Burma the words from “and shall take effect” to the end of the section were omitted by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

PRACTICE.

Jurisdiction.—By the terms of the Statute 24 & 25 Vic., c. 104 (now re-enacted in the Government of India Act, 1935, s. 223), the exercise of jurisdiction in any part of His Majesty’s Indian territories by the High Courts was meant to be subject to, and not exclusive of, the general legislative power of the Governor-General in Council. place or territory is removed from the jurisdiction of the High Courts, is one expressly contemplated by the above statute, and by the Letters Patent issued under that statute.²²

As regards the jurisdiction of British Courts on railways in Indian States the Courts ought to ascertain whether the jurisdiction granted relates only to offences committed on the railway or in any way connected with its administration or whether the jurisdiction is general criminal jurisdiction irrespective of the place where the offence is committed. If the jurisdiction ceded is not general criminal jurisdiction, then a person who has committed an offence in British territory cannot be arrested at a station on a railway line passing through an Indian State.²³

2. Every person¹ shall be liable to punishment under this Code and not otherwise² for every act or omission³ contrary to the provisions thereof,⁴ of which he shall be guilty within British India.

Punishment of offences committed within British India.

COMMENT.

This section deals with the intra-territorial operation of the Code. It makes the Code universal in its application to all parts of British India. But in the case of certain districts,²⁴ the local Government to which any such district is annexed may, with the sanction of the Governor-General in Council, notify that the Code is not in force in such district.

Prosecution could be instituted under the Code at any time after the offence is committed. Nullum tempus occurrit regi (lapse of time does not bar the right of the Crown).

1. 'Every person.'—Every person is made liable to punishment, without distinction of nation, rank, caste or creed, provided the offence with which he is charged has been committed in some part of British India.

The Law Commissioners in their address²⁵ observe: "Your Lordship in Council will see that we have not proposed to except from the operation of this Code any of the ancient sovereign houses of India residing within the Company's territories. Whether any such exception ought to be made is a question which, without a more accurate knowledge than we possess of existing treaties, of the sense in which those treaties have been understood, of the history of negotiations, of the temper and of the power of particular families, and of the feeling of the body of the people towards those families, we could not venture to decide. We will only beg permission most respectfully to observe that every such exception is an evil; that it is an evil that any man should be above the law; that it is a still greater evil that the public should be taught to regard as a high and enviable distinction the privilege of being above the law; that the longer such privileges are suffered to last, the more difficult it is to take them away; that there can scarcely ever be a fairer opportunity for taking them away than at the time when the Government promulgates a new Code binding alike on persons of different races and religions; and that we greatly doubt whether any consideration, except that of public faith solemnly pledged, deserves to be weighed against the advantages of equal justice".

A foreigner who enters the British territories and thus accepts the protection of British laws virtually gives an assurance of his fidelity and obedience to them and submits himself to their operation. It is no defence on behalf of a foreigner that he did not know he was doing wrong, the act not being an offence in his own country.¹ The Greek residents of Zanzibar, having been, by international action, placed under British protection, were held liable to the British criminal law in force at Zanzibar. The Court further decided that it was competent to the Crown to exercise jurisdiction in one foreign State over the subjects of another foreign State, that under Her Majesty's Order in Council the provisions referring to British subjects were applicable to foreigners enjoying British protection in so far as by treaty, capitulation, grant, usage, sufferance, or other lawful means, His Majesty has jurisdiction at Zanzibar in relation to such persons; and that the accused, being a British protected person within the meaning of s. 4 (h) of the Order, was amenable to the jurisdiction of the Consular Court.²

Under this section every person is liable to punishment for an act which is an offence under the Penal Code; but the criminal Courts have no jurisdiction to try certain persons even if they have transgressed the provisions of the Code. Following are the recognized exceptions :—

Exceptions.—Statutory bar to the trial of certain high dignitaries of the State.—No proceedings shall lie in, and no process shall issue from, any Court in India against the Governor-General, the Governor of a Province, or the Secretary of State, whether in personal capacity or otherwise.³ Except with the sanction of His Majesty in Council, no proceedings shall lie in any Court against them in respect of any thing done or omitted to be done by any of them during his term of office in performance of the duties thereof.⁴ Offences committed by them shall be inquired of, heard, tried and determined in the Court of King's Bench in London⁵ under the special procedure laid down in certain statutes.⁶ Under several statutes public servants are protected against prosecution for acts done in pursuance thereof.⁷ Under the Government of India Act, 1935, the exemption is confined to the Governor-General, Governor of a Province, the Secretary of State or His Majesty's Representative for the exercise of the functions of the Crown in its relations with Indian States,⁸ and to the Governor of Burma.⁹

The following persons are always exempted from the jurisdiction of the criminal Courts of every country :—

1. Sovereign.—The Sovereign can do no wrong, and is, therefore, not liable to punishment. Blackstone¹⁰ says : “...no suit or action can be brought against the king, even in civil matters, because no court can have jurisdiction over him. For all jurisdiction implies superiority of power : authority to try would be vain and idle, without an authority to redress; and the sentence of a court would be contemptible, unless that court had power to command the execution of it : but who, says Finch, shall command the king ? Hence it is likewise, that by law the person of the king is sacred, even though the measures pursued in his reign be completely tyrannical and arbitrary : for no jurisdiction upon earth has power to try him in a criminal way; much less to condemn him to punishment. If any foreign jurisdiction had this power, as was formerly claimed by the Pope, the independence of the kingdom would be no more : and, if such a power were vested in any domestic tribunal, there would soon be an end of the constitution, by destroying the free agency of one of the constituent parts of the sovereign legislative power.”

2. Foreign Sovereigns.—The world being composed of distinct sovereignties, possessing equal rights and equal independence, whose mutual benefit is promoted by intercourse with each other, and by an interchange of those good offices which humanity dictates and its wants require, all sovereigns have consented to a relaxation in practice, in cases under certain peculiar circumstances, of that absolute and complete jurisdiction within their respective territories which sovereignty confers.... One sovereign being in no respect amenable to another and being bound by obligations of the highest character not to degrade the dignity of his nation, by placing himself or its sovereign rights within the jurisdiction of another, can be supposed to enter a foreign territory only under an express license, or in the confidence that the immunities belonging to his independent sovereign station, though not expressly stipulated, are reserved by implication, and will be extended to him.¹¹ The real principle on which the exemption of every sovereign from the jurisdiction of every Court has been deduced is that the exercise of such jurisdiction would be incompatible with his regal dignity—that is to say, with his absolute independence of every superior authority.¹²

Indian Princes.—The offences committed by Indian Princes in British India are usually tried by a commission appointed by the Government of India. The commissioners submit their report to the Government which passes final orders. There is no appeal to any tribunal.¹³

3. Ambassadors.—The immunity of an ambassador from the jurisdiction of the Courts of the country to which he is accredited is based upon his being the representative of the independent sovereign or state which sends him, and which sends him upon the faith of his being admitted to be clothed with the same independence of and superiority to all adverse jurisdiction as the sovereign authority whom he represents would be.¹⁴ "He does not owe even a temporary allegiance to the Sovereign to whom he is accredited, and he has at least as great privileges from suits as the Sovereign whom he represents. He is not supposed even to live within the territory of the Sovereign to whom he is accredited, and, if he has done nothing to forfeit or to waive his privilege, he is for all juridical purposes supposed still to be in his own country".¹⁵ If he grossly offends, or makes an ill use of his character, he may be sent home and accused before his master, who is bound either to do justice upon him, or avow himself the accomplice of his crimes. But there is great dispute among the writers on the laws of nations, whether this exemption of ambassadors extends to all crimes, as well natural as positive; or whether it only extends to such as are mala prohibita, as coining, and not to those that are mala in se, as murder.¹⁶ For a direct attempt against the life of the sovereign, an ambassador or one of his suite would directly be punishable by the State.¹⁷

Diplomatic privilege does not impart immunity from legal liability, but only exemption from local jurisdiction. The privilege is the privilege of the Sovereign by whom the diplomatic agent is accredited, and it may be waived with the sanction of the Sovereign or of the official superior of the agent.¹⁸

4. Alien enemies.—In respect of acts of war alien enemies cannot be tried by criminal Courts. Aliens, "who in a hostile manner invade the kingdom, whether their king were at war or peace with ours, and whether they come by themselves or in company with English traitors, cannot be punished as traitors, but shall be dealt with by martial law."¹⁹ If an alien enemy commits a crime unconnected with war, e.g., theft, he would be triable by ordinary criminal Courts.

5. Foreign army.—When armies or regiments of a State are by consent on the soil of a foreign State they are exempted from the jurisdiction of the State on whose soil they are.

6. Warships.—Men-of-war of a State in foreign waters are exempt from the jurisdiction of the State within whose territorial jurisdiction they are. On the question of jurisdiction two theories have been propounded. "One is that a public ship of a nation for all purposes either is, or is to be treated by other nations as, part of the territory of the nation to which she belongs. By this conception will be guided the domestic law of any country in whose territorial waters the ship finds herself. There will therefore be no jurisdiction in fact in any Court where jurisdiction depends upon the act in question, or the party to the proceedings, being done or found or resident in the local territory. The other theory is that a public ship in foreign waters is not, and is not treated as, territory of her own nation. The domestic Courts, in accordance with principles of international law, will accord to the ship and its crew and its contents certain immunities, some of which are well settled, though others are in dispute. In this view, the immunities do not depend upon an objective ex-territoriality but on implication of the domestic law. They are conditional, and can in any case be waived by the nation to which the public ship belongs".²⁰ The Privy Council has considered the latter theory as the correct conclusion, and has rejected the doctrine of ex-territoriality which regards the public ship "as a floating portion of the flag-State."²¹ "The true view is that, in accordance with the conventions of international law, the territorial sovereign grants to foreign sovereigns and their envoys, and public ships, and the naval forces carried by such ships, certain immunities. Some are well settled; others are uncertain. When the local Court is faced with a case where such immunities come into question, it has to decide whether in the particular case the immunity exists or not. If it is clear that it does, the Court will of its own initiative give effect to it. The sovereign himself, his envoy, and his property, including his public armed ships, are not to be subjected to legal process. These immunities are well settled".²²

Corporation.—The words 'every person' in this section, in spite of s. 11, mean natural persons, and do not include juridical persons, such as corporations. A crime, if committed by such a body, is, as a rule, only punishable as committed by such members of it as took part in the act. Under s. 6 of the Indian Merchandise Marks Act, a corporation can be prosecuted and convicted, because a corporation through its agents can entertain an intention to apply a false trade description to goods.²³ An officer of a company made a false return under the Motor Fuel Rationing Order, 1941. On the prosecution of the company and the officer it was contended that the offences charged required for their commission an act of will or state of mind which a body corporate could not have. It was held that the knowledge and intention of its servants were to be imputed to the body corporate.²⁴

Liability of master for acts of his servant.—The section says 'every person' will be guilty under this section for an act or omission contrary to the provisions of the Code. If a servant alone commits an offence his master may also be guilty under provisions relating to abetment,²⁵ or under certain other sections of the Code which impose liability on the master even though he may be entirely ignorant of his acts, e.g., s. 154. But the question very often arises whether a master is liable for criminal acts of his servant done without his knowledge but in the course of his employment. So far as civil liability goes it is a recognized principle that a master is liable for all tortious acts of his servant done in the course of his employment. A master, however, is not criminally responsible for the unauthorized acts of his servant. He only is criminally punishable, who immediately does the act, or permits it to be done.¹ While prima facie a principal is not to be made criminally responsible for the acts of his servants, yet the Legislature may prohibit an act or enforce a duty in such words as to make the prohibition or the duty absolute; in which case the principal is liable if the act is in fact done by his servants. To ascertain whether a particular Act has that effect or not regard must be had to the object of the statute, the words used, the nature of the duty laid down, the person upon whom it is imposed, the person by whom it would in ordinary circumstances be performed, and the person upon whom the penalty is imposed.² The condition of mind of a servant or agent is not imputed to the master or principal so as to make him criminally liable. A master is not criminally liable merely because his servant or agent commits a negligent or malicious or fraudulent Act. But in the limited class of cases where a particular intent or state of mind is not of the essence of the offence, the acts or defaults of a servant or agent in the ordinary course of his employment may make the master or principal criminally liable, although he was not aware of such acts or defaults, and even where they were against his orders.³ But a master cannot be so made liable, if the statute provides for liability for permitting or causing a particular act, unless it is shown that such act was done with the master's knowledge and assent, express or implied.⁴

The following are the exceptions to the principle that a master is not criminally liable for the acts of his servant.

1. Statutory liability.—A statute may impose criminal liability upon the master as regards the acts or omissions of his servants. But in all such cases the question is whether upon the true construction of the statute in question the master is intended to be made criminally responsible for acts done by his servants in contravention of the statute, where such acts are done within the scope or in the course of their employment.⁵ The master is relieved from criminal responsibility where he proves that he acted in good faith and had done all that it was reasonably possible to do to prevent the commission by his agents and servants of offences against the statute. Similarly, if a servant does that for which he is not employed,⁶ or if he acts for his own personal benefit,⁷ the master will not be liable.

License cases form a class by themselves in which the master is generally held responsible.

Licenses to keep ale-houses are granted only to persons of good personal character, and it is obvious that the object of so restricting the grant of licenses will be defeated if the licensed persons can, by delegating the control and management of the house to other persons who are altogether unfit to keep it, free themselves from the responsibility for the manner in which the house is conducted.⁸ Personal knowledge in the licensed person of the acts of his servants is not always necessary; otherwise enactments granting licenses to good persons would be of no effect. Where the servant of a licensed victualler knowingly supplied liquor to a constable on duty, without the authority of his superior officer as required by a statute, it was held that the licensed victualler was liable to be convicted under 35 & 36 Vic., c. 94, s. 16, sub-s. (2), although he had not knowledge of the act of his servant.⁹ In the case of license-holders it has been again and again decided that the responsibility should be upon the licensee for acts done by an employee within the scope of his authority although contrary to the licensee's orders.¹⁰ The same principle is followed in India. Where, therefore, the manager of a licensed vendor of arms, ammunition and military stores, sold certain military stores without previously ascertaining that the buyer was legally authorized to possess the same, it was held that the licensee was liable to punishment under s. 22 of the Arms Act (XI of 1878) though the goods were not sold with his knowledge and consent.¹¹ Similarly, where the servant of a licensed vendor of opium sold opium to a boy under the age of fourteen years the licensed vendor was held liable under s. 9 of the Opium Act (I of 1878).¹² The accused held a license for the manufacture of explosives, one of the conditions of which was that the explosives should be manufactured in a tent or lightly constructed building quite apart from the dwelling house. The deceased was employed by the accused to work in such a house exclusively appropriated for the purpose. On the day in question, while the accused was attending to another business of his, the deceased and her assistant went to his dwelling house to drink water, and on their own initiative took the materials there and commenced to pound them in that house with pestles having iron rings, which they picked up in that house. The result was an explosion which killed the woman and caused injuries to her assistant. The accused was tried for a breach of the condition in his license. It was held that he was liable for the act of the deceased, which, though unauthorized by him, was yet done by her within the general scope of her employment.¹³ Where a person obtained a license to proceed in a bus with music for distributing handbills and the license specifically excluded certain thoroughfares but the licensee's servant drove the bus through prohibited streets, it was held that the licensee was as much liable as the servant who drove the bus.¹⁴ Where the accused had obtained from Government a grant of lands for cultivation containing teak trees under a license granted under the Burma Forest Act and the accused's servant unlawfully felled certain teak trees and unlawfully impressed green timber trees with certain marks contrary to the terms of the license, it was held that as the Forest Act cast an absolute duty upon the licensee that no tree should be felled or impressed with marks except in strict conformity with the terms of the license, the accused was liable for the acts of his servant.¹⁵

Statutes passed for the benefit of public health and sanitation are construed in the same way as licensing Acts.¹⁶ Similar is the case with statutes dealing with revenue matters.¹⁷

2. Public nuisance.—The owner of works, carried on for his profit by his agents, is liable to be indicted for a public nuisance caused by acts of his agents, in carrying on the works, though done by them without his knowledge and contrary to his general orders.¹⁸ If persons for their own advantage employ servants to conduct works, they must be answerable for what is done by the servants even though they are personally ignorant of the way in which the work is carried on and though there is a departure in the way in which it was understood to be carried on.¹⁹

The Calcutta High Court has held that a principal is not criminally answerable for the acts of his agent. Where the user of premises gives rise to a nuisance, the person liable is the occupier for the time being, whoever he may be. The proprietor, if not living on the premises, might be liable for abetment. The English cases above referred to were held to be of no authority on the construction of the provisions of the Penal Code.²⁰

3. Neglect of duty.—If a person neglects the performance of an act, which is likely to cause danger to others, and entrusts it to unskilful hands he will be in certain cases criminally liable. Where an engineer, employed to manage a steam-engine engaged to draw up miners from a coal pit, left the engine in the charge of an ignorant boy, who told him that he was unable to manage it, and in the absence of the engineer

a man was drawn up, who was killed from the want of skill in the boy to manage the engine, it was held that the engineer was guilty of manslaughter.²¹ Similarly, where a master employed a servant to use alum in loaves, the unrestrained use of that drug was noxious, and did not restrain him in the use of it, it was held that the master would be answerable if the servant used it in excess because he did not apply proper precautions against its misuse.²² But if a skilful person is employed, the employer will not be liable in the absence of express malice.²³

The liability of a proprietor of a newspaper for acts of the editor in allowing libellous matter to be published is restricted by Statute 6 & 7 Vic., c. 96, s. 7.²⁴ Before the passing of the statute the proprietor was considered prima facie answerable for what appeared in his paper, but this presumption arising from mere proprietorship was rebuttable.²⁵ If the master as well as the servant are made liable under a statute for a certain course of conduct the servant alone will be responsible for an act done in contravention of the statute.¹ But the master may be liable unless he shows good faith. Thus, the provisions of s. 2, sub-s. (2), of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vic., c. 78), which make it an offence to sell goods to which a forged trade-mark or false trade-description is applied, make a master criminally liable for acts done by his servants in contravention of the section.² It was held, similarly, where gaming had taken place upon licensed premises to the knowledge of a servant of the licensed person who was in charge of the premises, but without any knowledge or connivance on the part of the licensed person.³

2. 'And not otherwise.'—These words repeal all former laws for the punishment of any offence which is made punishable by the Code. On the strength of this section the Calcutta High Court has held that English common law cannot be followed to enlarge the scope of the exceptions to s. 499 of the Penal Code, which should be regarded as exhaustive.⁴ The rules of the common law of England or the legal maxims embodying certain judicial principles, however wholesome they may be, cannot be engrafted upon the Penal Code.⁵ The Law Commissioners⁶ say: "We do not advise the general repeal of the penal laws now existing in the Territories for which we have recommended the enactment of the Code. We think it will be more expedient to provide only that no man shall be tried or punished (except by a Court Martial) for any facts which constitute any offence defined in the Code, otherwise than according to its provisions." Acts or omissions made penal by any other statute but not by the Code will be governed by that statute. See s. 5, infra, as to the laws not affected by the Penal Code.

3. 'Act or omission.'—See s. 33, infra.

4. 'Contrary to the provisions thereof.'—In *Barendra Kumar Ghosh v. The King-Emperor*⁷ the Privy Council observed: "That the criminal law of India is prescribed by and, so far as it goes, is contained in the Indian Penal Code; that accordingly (as the Code itself shows) the criminal law of India and that of England differ in sundry respects; and that the Code has first of all to be construed in accordance with its natural meaning and irrespective of any assumed intention on the part of its framers to leave unaltered the law as it existed before, are, though commonplaces, considerations which it is important never to forget. It is, however, equally true that the Code must not be assumed to have sought to introduce differences from the prior law." A codifying statute like the Indian Penal Code does not exclude reference to earlier case-law on the subjects covered by the statute for the purpose of throwing light on the true interpretation of the words of the statute where they are, or can be contended to be, open to rival constructions; but matter outside of the statute cannot be invoked not by way of construing its provisions but of adding something to it which is admittedly not to be found within it.⁸

It is not an offence to do an act in anticipation of a statute or enactment which would make that act an offence.⁹

Principles of interpretation.—"All penal Statutes are to be construed strictly, that is to say, the Court must see that the thing charged as an offence is within the plain meaning of the words used, and must not strain the words on any notion that there has been a slip, that there has been a casus omissus, that the thing is so clearly within the mischief that it must have been intended to be included and would have been included if thought of. On the other hand, the person charged has a right to say that the thing charged, although within the words, is not within the spirit of the enactment. But where the thing is brought within the words and within the spirit, there a penal enactment is to be construed, like any other instrument, according to the fair commonsense meaning of the language used, and the Court is not to find or make any doubt or ambiguity in the language of a penal statute, where such doubt or ambiguity would clearly not be found or made in the same language in any other instruments".¹⁰ Criminal enactments are not to be extended by construction. When an offence against the law is alleged, and when the Court has to consider whether that alleged offence falls within the language of a criminal statute, the Court must be satisfied, not only that the spirit of the legislative enactment has been violated, but also that the language used by the legislature includes the offence in question, and makes it criminal.¹¹ Nothing is to be regarded as within the meaning of the statute which is not within the letter—which is not clearly and intelligibly described in the very words of the statute itself.¹² Also in the interpretation of Acts the elementary rule is to give full and accurate effect to every word used in them.¹³ The Courts, in the exposition of penal statutes, are not to narrow the construction. They are to look to the words in the first instance, and where the words are plain, they are to decide on them. If the words be doubtful, they are then to have recourse to the subject-matter; but at all events it is only a secondary rule.¹⁴ The essence of a Code is to be exhaustive on the matters in respect of which it declares the law, and it is not the province of a Judge to disregard or go outside the letter of the enactment according to its true construction.¹⁵

The proper course to adopt in construing an Act "is in the first instance to examine the language of the statute and to ask what is its natural meaning, uninfluenced by any considerations derived from the previous state of the law, and not to start with inquiring how the law previously stood, and then, assuming that it was probably intended to leave it unaltered, to see if the words of the enactment will bear an interpretation in conformity with this view. If a statute, intended to embody in a code a particular branch of the law, is to be treated in this fashion, it appears to me that its utility will be almost entirely destroyed, and the very object with which it was enacted will be frustrated. The purpose of such a statute surely was that on any point specifically dealt with by it, the law should be ascertained by interpreting the language used instead of, as before, by roaming over a vast number of authorities in order to discover what the law was, extracting it by a minute critical examination of the prior decisions, dependent upon a knowledge of the exact effect even of an obsolete proceeding such as a demurrer to evidence. I am of course far from asserting that resort may never be had to the previous state of the law for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the provisions of the code. If, for example, a provision be of doubtful import, such resort would be perfectly legitimate. Or, again, if in a code of the law of negotiable instruments words be found which have previously acquired a technical meaning, or been used in a sense other than their ordinary one, in relation to such instruments, the same interpretation might well be put upon them in the code. I give these as examples merely; they, of course, do not exhaust the category. What, however, I am venturing to insist upon is, that the first step taken should be to interpret the language of the statute, and that an appeal to earlier decisions can only be justified on some special ground".¹⁶ In the same case Lord Halsbury said: "It seems to me that, construing the statute by adding to it words which are neither found therein nor for which authority could be found in the language of the statute itself, is to sin against one of the most familiar rules of construction, and I am wholly unable to adopt the view that, where a statute is expressly said to codify the law, you are at liberty to go outside the code so created, because before the existence of that code another law prevailed".¹⁷ If it is wrong to assume that in codifying existing law, the Legislature intended to leave it unaltered unless that intention is expressly stated, it would be more and not less wrong to assume that in introducing a foreign law into a country the Legislature intended to introduce the whole of it unless the contrary is expressly stated.¹⁸ In the construction of codes the language of the statute and its natural meaning must be first examined, uninfluenced by any consideration of the previous law on the point, and an interpretation cannot be placed on the plain language of a statute inconsistent therewith on the supposed policy of the Legislature not to depart from the English law on the subject.¹⁹ But it is incorrect to suppose that, in construing Acts of the Indian Legislature, the natural meaning of the words of the sections should be given effect to always, regardless of their origin and history, and regardless of previous decisions and especially of decisions other than those of Indian Courts.²⁰ When the language used by the Legislature admits of two constructions, the Court should not adopt a construction which would lead to an absurdity or obvious injustice but should adopt that construction which appears to be most in accord with convenience, reason and justice.²¹ Where two meanings are possible, that which is more favourable to the subject is to be taken.²²

The object of the legislature must be ascertained from within the four corners of the Act. It is not open to the Court to speculate as to what the legislature probably meant, and then do violence to the language of the enactment in order to give effect to the presumed intention.²³ Where the words of a section in a statute are plain, the Court must give effect to them, and the Court is not justified in depriving the words of their only proper meaning in order to give effect to some intention which the Court imputes to the legislature from other provisions of the Act. Such a course can only be justified where a literal construction of the section is inconsistent with the meaning of the statute as a whole.²⁴ It is the duty of a Court to attempt to find the intention of the legislature, and to give effect to that intention. The more literal construction ought not to prevail, if it is opposed to the intention of the legislature, as apparent by the statute; and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction by which that intention would be better effectuated.²⁵ But if such a method of interpretation leads to manifest anomalies and is calculated to defeat the professed and declared intention of the legislature it is open to the Courts to give the go-by to the rule mentioned above and to so interpret the words used as to give effect to the intention of the legislature.¹ A Judge must always consider the effect of any construction which he is asked to put on an Act of Parliament, and if he comes to the conclusion that a particular construction leads to a result which he considers irrational or unfair, he is entitled, and indeed bound, to assume that the legislature did not intend such a construction to be adopted, and to try to find some more rational meaning to which the words are sensible.² A statute should be interpreted according to the plain meaning of the words and should not be given a wider meaning than what the words used would actually denote.³ Although it may, perhaps, be legitimate to call history in aid to shew what facts existed to bring about a statute, the inferences to be drawn therefrom are extremely slight.⁴ In construing an Act the Court must always have regard to the scheme of the Act as appearing from a perusal of the language of the whole enactment.⁵

A penal statute should, when its language is ambiguous, be construed in the manner most favourable to the liberties of the subject, especially so when it is of an exceptional character.⁶ Statutes which encroach on the rights of the subject whether as regards person or property are subject to a strict construction in this sense, and they should be interpreted if possible so as to respect such rights.⁷ Where an equivocal word or ambiguous sentence leaves a reasonable doubt of its meaning which the canons of interpretation fail to solve, the benefit of the doubt should be given to the subject and against the legislature which has failed to explain itself.⁸

A general statute is to be construed as not repealing by mere implication a particular one, that is, one directed to a special object or a special class of objects.⁹

The following principles, as laid down in Maxwell,¹⁰ will generally govern the construction of penal laws:—

The paramount duty of the judicial interpreter is to put upon the language of the Legislature, honestly and faithfully, its plain and rational meaning and to promote its object...it is for the Legislature, not the Court, to define a crime and ordain its punishment. It is unquestionably a reasonable expectation that, when the former intends the infliction of suffering, or an encroachment on natural liberty or rights, or the grant of exceptional exemptions, powers, and privileges, it will not leave its intention to be gathered by mere doubtful inference, or convey it in "cloudy and dark words" only, but will manifest it with reasonable clearness. The rule of strict construction does not, indeed, require or sanction that suspicious scrutiny of the words, or those hostile conclusions from their ambiguity or from what is left unexpressed, which characterise the judicial interpretation of affidavits in support of ex parte applications, or of magistrates' convictions, where the ambiguity goes to the jurisdiction. Nor does it allow the imposition of a restricted meaning on the words, wherever any doubt can be suggested, to withdraw from the operation of the statute a case which falls both within its scope and the fair sense of its language. This would be to defeat, not to promote, the object of the Legislature; to misread the statute and misunderstand its purpose. A Court is not at liberty to put a limitation on general words which is not called for by the sense, or the objects, or the mischiefs of the enactment, and no construction is admissible which would sanction a fraudulent evasion of an Act. But the rule of strict construction requires that the language shall be so construed that no cases shall be held to fall within it which do not fall both within the reasonable meaning of its terms and within the spirit and scope of the enactment. Where an enactment may entail penal consequences, no violence must be done to its language to bring people within it, but rather care must be taken that no one is brought within it who is not within its express language. To determine that a case is within the intention of a statute, its language must authorize the Court to say so, but it is not admissible to carry the principle that a case which is within the mischief of a statute is within its provisions so far as to punish a crime not specified in the statute, because it is of equal atrocity or of a kindred character with those which are enumerated. If the Legislature has not used words sufficiently comprehensive to include within its prohibition all the cases which fall within the mischief intended to be prevented, it is not competent to a Court to extend them. It is immaterial, for this purpose, whether the proceeding prescribed for the enforcement of the penal law be criminal or civil.

The degree of strictness applied to the construction of a penal statute depended in great measure on the severity of the statute. Where it merely imposed a pecuniary penalty, it was construed less strictly than where the rule was invoked in favorem vitæ....

A strict construction requires, at least, that no case shall fall within a penal statute which does not comprise all the elements which, whether morally material or not, are in fact made to constitute the offence as defined by the statute... As illustrative of the rule of strict construction, it has been said that while remedial laws may extend to new things not in esse at the time of making the statute, penal laws may not...

The general principle... is well exemplified by comparing the manner in which an omission which, it was inferable from the text, was the result of accident, has been generally dealt with in penal and in remedial Acts.

The rule of strict construction, however, whenever invoked, comes attended with qualifications and other rules no less important, and it is by the light which each contributes that the meaning must be determined. Among them is the rule that that sense of the words is to be adopted which best harmonises with the context and promotes in the fullest manner the policy and object of the Legislature. The paramount object, in construing penal as well as other statutes, is to ascertain the legislative intent, and the rule of strict construction is not violated by permitting the words to have their full meaning, or the more extensive of two meanings, when best effectuating the intention. They are, indeed, frequently taken in the widest sense, sometimes even in a sense more wide than etymologically belongs or is popularly attached to them, in order to carry out effectually the legislative intent, or, to use Lord Coke's words, to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy....

The tendency of modern decisions, upon the whole, is to narrow materially the difference between what is called a strict and a beneficial construction. All statutes are now construed with a more attentive regard to the language, and criminal statutes with a more rational regard to the aim and intention of the Legislature, than formerly. It is unquestionably right that the distinction should not be altogether erased from the judicial mind, for it is required by the spirit of our free institutions that the interpretation of all statutes should be favourable to personal liberty, and this tendency is still evinced in a certain reluctance to supply the defects of language, or to eke out the meaning of an obscure passage by strained or doubtful inferences. The effect of the rule of strict construction might almost be summed up in the remark that, where an equivocal word or ambiguous sentence leaves a reasonable doubt of its meaning which the canons of interpretation fail to solve, the benefit of the doubt should be given to the subject; and against the Legislature which has failed to explain itself. But it yields to the paramount rule that every statute is to be expounded according to its expressed or manifest intention and that all cases within the mischiefs aimed at are, if the language permits, to be held to fall within its remedial influence.

The phrase 'intention of the Legislature' is, says Lord Watson in *Saloman v. Salomon & Co.*¹¹, "a common but very slippery phrase, which, popularly understood, may signify anything from intention embodied in positive enactment to speculative opinion as to what the Legislature probably would have meant, although there has been an omission to enact it. In a Court of Law or Equity, what the Legislature intended to be done or not to be done can only be legitimately ascertained from that which it has chosen to enact, either in express words or by reasonable and necessary implication." It is well settled that the intention of the Legislature must be gathered from the language used to express it... No doubt where the language of an enactment is capable of bearing more than one meaning or where if construed literally it would lead to absurd results, it is proper that the Court should ascertain the true intention by acquainting itself with the law which existed before the Act was passed and what was the mischief which was thereby intended to be remedied.¹² "In construing an Act of Parliament the Court always has to ascertain the intention of the legislature from the language of the whole enactment, and it sometimes becomes necessary to do a certain amount of violence to the language in which a particular passage is couched in order to give effect to the intention to be gathered from the enactment as a whole".¹³ Where the words used themselves declare the intention of the Legislature, it is inadmissible to consider the advantages or disadvantages of applying the plain meaning whether in the interest of the prosecution or the accused. Where the meaning of words used in a statute is plain it is not the duty of the Courts to busy themselves with supposed intentions of the Legislature in framing the statute.¹⁴ When the grammatical meaning of a section is clear and unique that alone must be applied unless that meaning leads to an impossible, that is, an unworkable construction, in which case the Court should consider what variation will do the least violence to the grammatical meaning and still make the provision work. The grammatical meaning cannot be departed from simply because it leads to a very unjust conclusion.¹⁵ Where the language of a statute, in its ordinary meaning and grammatical construction, leads to a manifest contradiction of the apparent purpose of the enactment, ... a construction may be put upon it which modifies the meaning of the words and even the structure of the sentence.¹⁶

The Legislature is presumed to enact prospectively and not retrospectively. While this principle is of general application, it is followed with particular strictness in reference to penal statutes.¹⁷ If an offence is committed under a section of the Code which is amended before the conviction of the accused takes place, the provisions of the section as they existed prior to the amendment will apply to the case. It is by reason of the commission of the offence that the offender incurs the punishment and not by reason of his conviction by a criminal Court.¹⁸

Legislative body, cannot be referred to in the interpretation of an Act, for they are not part of the Act as passed by the Legislature.² Subsequently it has held that when the language of a statute is clear it is not permissible to refer to any extraneous matter such as Statements of Objects and Reasons to find out what the real intention of the legislature was.^{2a}

Debates in Legislature.—Such debates cannot be referred to in the interpretation of an Act, for they are not part of the Act as passed by the Legislature.³

Headings.—The headings of different portions of a statute can be referred to to determine the sense of any doubtful expression in a section ranged under any particular heading.⁴ They cannot control the plain meaning of the words of the enactment, though they may, in some cases, be looked at in the light of preambles if there is any ambiguity in the meaning of the sections on which they can throw light.⁵ General words in the heading of a group of sections cannot be construed as limiting the effect of plain words in a section contained in that group.⁶ In cases of doubt Courts may be guided by the position in an Act of a particular section. Headings and marginal notes are inserted in a statute only after a bill has become law. They are not voted on or passed by Parliament.⁷

Marginal notes.—The Privy Council has ruled that the marginal notes to the sections of an Act cannot be referred to for the purpose of construing the Act.⁸ There is no justification for restricting the contents of a section by its marginal notes.^{8a} They are no part of the Act.⁹ A marginal note is merely an abstract of the clause intended to catch the eye.¹⁰ In a Full Bench case the Allahabad High Court has held that marginal notes to sections of an act can be referred to for the purpose of interpretation if they can be regarded as inserted by, or under the authority of, or assented to by the Legislature.¹¹ Where a possibility of ambiguity may arise by the words of a section, a marginal note can be used to clear it.¹²

Provisos.—In construing a section full and natural meaning should be given to a proviso if any.¹³ The proper function of a proviso is to except and deal with a case which would otherwise fall within the general language of the main enactment and its effect is confined to that case. Where the language of the main enactment is clear and unambiguous a proviso can have no repercussion on the interpretation of the main enactment so as to exclude from it by implication what clearly falls within its express terms.¹⁴ Where a section contains a proviso there is no rule that the first part, which may be described as the enacting part, is to be construed without reference to the proviso. The section must be construed as a whole, each portion throwing light on the rest.¹⁵ time often serve as a defence of the law. In our definitions we have repeatedly found ourselves under the necessity of sacrificing neatness and perspicuity to precision, and of using harsh expressions because we could find no other expressions which would convey our whole meaning, and no more than our whole meaning. Such definitions standing by themselves might repel and perplex the reader, and would perhaps be fully comprehended only by a few students after long application. Yet such definitions are found, and must be found, in every system of law which aims at accuracy. A legislator may, if he thinks fit, avoid such definitions, and by avoiding them, he will give a smoother and more attractive appearance to his workmanship; but in that case he flinches from a duty which he ought to perform, and which somebody must perform. If this necessary but most disagreeable work be not performed by the law giver once for all, it must be constantly performed in a rude and imperfect manner by every judge in the empire, and will probably be performed by no two judges in the same way. We have therefore thought it right not to shrink from the task of framing these unpleasing but indispensable parts of a Code."¹⁶

"The illustrations will lead the mind of the student through the same steps by which the minds of those who framed the law proceeded, and may sometimes show him that a phrase which may have struck him as uncouth, or a distinction which he may have thought idle, was deliberately adopted for the purpose of including or excluding a large class of important cases. In the study of geometry it is constantly found that a theorem which, read by itself, conveyed no distinct meaning to the mind, becomes perfectly clear as soon as the reader casts his eye over the statement of the individual case taken for the purpose of demonstration. Our illustrations, we trust, will in a similar manner facilitate the study of the law."¹⁷

The Privy Council has laid down that illustrations to an Indian statute are to be taken as part of the statute.¹⁸ The function of an illustration is to show how the principle already enunciated in the section of the enactment to which the illustration is appended is to be applied, or how the particular facts of the case supposed by the illustration come under the principle.¹⁹ Illustrations cannot have the effect of modifying the language of the section which alone forms the enactment.²⁰ They furnish some indication of the presumable intention of the Legislature. They are not binding when inconsistent with the language of the section.²¹ They ought not to be construed as limiting the right given by the section.²² They cannot control the general words of a section.²³ They may be useful so far as they explain the meaning of the section, but must never be allowed to control its plain meaning, especially when the effect would be to curtail a right, which it would, in its ordinary sense, confer.²⁴ of a Native State, who is guilty of retaining stolen property within the Native State, is not liable to be punished under the Code.²

By the terms of the Statute 24 & 25 Vic., c. 104, the exercise of jurisdiction in any part of His Majesty's Indian territories by the High Courts was meant to be subject to, and not exclusive of, the general legislative power of the Governor-General in Council. An exercise of legislative authority by the Governor-General in Council, whereby any place or territory is removed from the jurisdiction of the High Courts, is one expressly contemplated by the Statute 24 & 25 Vic., c. 104 (now s. 109 of 5 & 6 Geo. V, c. 61), and by the Letters Patent issued under that statute.³

The Legislature has no power over any persons except its own subjects—that is, persons natural-born subjects, or resident, or whilst they are within the limits of the kingdom. The Legislature can impose no duties except on them; and when legislating for the benefit of persons, must, prima facie, be considered to mean the benefit of those who owe obedience to our laws, and whose interests the Legislature is under a correlative obligation to protect.⁴ All crime is local. The jurisdiction over the crime belongs to the country where the crime is committed, and, except over his own subjects, Her Majesty and the Imperial Legislature have no power whatever.⁵

Territorial jurisdiction.—The general territorial jurisdiction of a State extends into the sea as far as a cannon shot will reach, which is usually calculated to be a marine league, or three miles. The territories, strictly speaking, of a State include, therefore, not only the compass of land, in the ordinary acceptance of the term, belonging to such State, but also that portion of the sea lying along and washing its coast, which is commonly called its "maritime territory." It is by the assent of nations that the three-mile belt of sea has been brought under the dominion of every State. In the Franconia case⁶ the question arose whether the British Courts had jurisdiction over a foreigner in command of a foreign ship, who, whilst passing within three miles of English shores, ran into a British ship and caused loss of life. It was held by seven out of thirteen Judges that in the absence of statutory enactment the Central Criminal Court had no power to try such an offence. This decision led to the passing of the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act,⁷ which has been extended to India.

Where a crime is committed in the territorial jurisdiction of one State as the direct result of the act of a person at the time corporeally present in another State, international law, by reason of the principle of constructive presence of the offender at the place where his act took effect, does not forbid the prosecution of the offender by the former State, should he come within its territorial jurisdiction. A French ship, the Lotus, collided, upon the high seas, with a Turkish ship which sank with loss of life of eight Turkish subjects. The French navigating officer, being later within Turkish territory, was arrested and tried for manslaughter by a Turkish Court, convicted and punished. The majority of the Judges of the Permanent Court of International Justice held that the Turkish jurisdiction could be supported on a territorial basis.⁸

Prior to the decision in the Franconia case and before the enactment of the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act (41 & 42 Vic., c. 73), the Bombay High Court had held that an offence committed on the high seas but within three miles from the coast of British India was punishable under the Penal Code as being committed within the territorial limits of British India. In this case certain of the inhabitants of a village sallied out in boats and pulled up and removed a number of fishing-stakes lawfully fixed in the sea within three miles from the shore by the villagers of a neighbouring village and it was held that the local criminal Court had jurisdiction over the offenders, and that the Penal Code was the substantive law applicable to the case.⁹

Section 2 of the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act (41 & 42 Vic., c. 73), says: "An offence committed by a person, whether he is or is not a subject of Her Majesty on the open sea within the territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions, is an offence within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, although it may have been committed on board or by means of a foreign ship, and the person who committed such offence may be arrested, tried and punished accordingly."

"'Offence,' as used in this Act, means an act, neglect, or default of such a description as would, if committed within the body of a county in England, be punishable on indictment according to the law of England" (s. 7). "The jurisdiction of the Admiral', as used in this Act, includes the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England and Ireland, or either of such jurisdictions as used in any Act of Parliament; and for the purpose of arresting any person charged with an offence declared by this Act to be within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, the territorial waters adjacent to the United Kingdom, or any other part of Her Majesty's dominions, shall be deemed to be within the jurisdiction of any judge, magistrate, or officer having power within such United Kingdom, or other part of Her Majesty's dominions, to issue warrants for arresting or to arrest persons charged with offences committed within the jurisdiction of such judge, magistrate, or officer" (ibid.). "'The territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions,' in reference to the sea, means such part of the sea adjacent to the coast of the United Kingdom, or the coast of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions, as is deemed by international law to be within the territorial sovereignty of Her Majesty; and for the purpose of any offence declared by this Act to be within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, any part of the open sea within one marine league of the coast measured from low-water mark shall be deemed to be open sea within the territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions" (ibid.).

"Proceedings for the trial and punishment of a person who is not a subject of Her Majesty, and who is charged with any such offence as is declared by this Act to be within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, shall not be instituted in any court of the United Kingdom, except with the consent of one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, and on his certificate that the institution of such proceedings is in his opinion expedient, and shall not be instituted in any of the dominions of Her Majesty out of the United Kingdom, except with the leave of the Governor of the part of the dominions in which such proceedings are proposed to be instituted, and on his certificate that it is expedient that such proceedings should be instituted" (s. 8).

It has been acknowledged by all nations that the Courts of a State have jurisdiction over its ports and harbours, the mouths of its rivers, and its land-locked bays. This principle has been followed in an old Bombay case.¹⁰ A foreigner committing an offence in any such place will be amenable to the jurisdiction of British Courts, whether or not his act amounted to an offence in his country. The accused was indicted for an unnatural offence, committed on board of an East India ship, lying in St. Katherine's Docks. It was argued that he was a native of Bagdad where his act would not have amounted to an offence. But the Court held that that was not a legal defence.¹¹

Amendment.—After the word "territories" there was the clause "on or after the said day of January, 1862," but it was omitted by Act XII of 1891, Schedule I. After the word "within" there were the words "the said territories." These were omitted and the words "British India" were substituted by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. In Burma the words "British Burma" were substituted by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

PRACTICE.

Jurisdiction.—Where it is doubtful whether the offence is committed in British or foreign territory, the question of jurisdiction cannot be fully determined unless the Magistrate proceeds with the investigation and states what in his opinion is proved by the evidence of the witnesses.¹²

3. Any person liable, by any Indian law,¹ to be tried for an offence committed beyond British India shall be dealt with according to the provisions of this Code for any act² committed beyond British India in the same manner as if such act had been committed within British India.

COMMENT.

This section only applies to the case of a person who, at the time of committing the offence charged, was amenable to British Courts.¹³ This and the following section relate to the extra-territorial operation of the Code.

1. 'By any Indian law.'—These words restrict the operation of the section to the cases specified in the Indian Extradition Act¹⁴ and ss. 186 and 188 of the Criminal Procedure Code. If an Indian commits an act in England which is not an offence in that country (e.g. adultery) but is punishable under the Penal Code, he may be prosecuted in India. A Native Indian subject of His Majesty, being a soldier in the Indian Army, committed a murder in Cyprus while on service in such army, and was charged with this offence at Agra. It was held that he might be dealt with in respect of such offence by the Criminal Court at Agra.¹⁵

The first statute dealing with offences committed beyond British India was the Offenders in Foreign States Act (I of 1849). It consolidated several Regulations dealing with the same subject-matter. Then came the Foreign Jurisdiction and Extradition Act (XI of 1872) which dealt with offences committed in Indian States. This Act was repealed by Act XXI of 1879. In the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882, the sections dealing with such offences in the Foreign Jurisdiction Act were incorporated as ss. 188 and 189. The Foreign Jurisdiction Act and the Extradition Act of 1879 were consolidated in 1903 as the Extradition Act (XI of 1903).

Legislative powers.—These are now governed by the Government of India Act, 1935, Part V. The legislative powers of the Indian Legislatures, Central and Provincial, which are all non-sovereign law-making bodies, arise from definite Parliamentary enactments. The powers are wide and plenary, but the authority they exercise is as completely subordinate to, and as much dependent upon, Acts of Parliament as is the power of any other body, which is a creature of a statute, to make bye-laws. When any particular case comes before the Courts, whether civil or criminal, in which the rights and liabilities of any party are affected by any legislation of an Indian Legislature, the Courts may have to determine with a view to the particular case whether such legislation was or was not within the legal powers of the Council. The Court however cannot declare invalid, annul or make void a law so passed, but if it is found ultra vires or unconstitutional they will refuse to give effect to it and treat it as void or invalid or having no legal existence.¹⁶

When an Act of the Government of India is outside the scope of the powers derived from an Act of Parliament, the High Court has power to declare such an enactment ultra vires and of no force and effect.¹⁷ The Bombay High Court had decided that the power of superintendence which the High Court had over Courts subject to its appellate jurisdiction, under s. 107 of the Government of India Act, 1915, could not be taken away by the Governor-General under ss. 71 and 72 of the Act which empowered him to make regulations and ordinances.¹⁸ The effect of the ratio in Balkrishna's case is negated by the Government of India Act, 1935, which provides: 'Nothing in this section shall be construed as giving to a High Court any jurisdiction to question any judgment of any inferior court which is not otherwise subject to appeal or revision.'¹⁹

Amendment.—The word "Indian" after "any" was added, and the words "passed by the Governor-General of India in Council" after the word "law" were omitted, by the Governor-General of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. After the words "offence committed beyond" there were the words "the limits of the said territories" and after the words "act committed beyond" there were the words "the said territories." Those words were omitted and the words "British India" were substituted by the same Order. In Burma the words "British Burma" were substituted for "the said territories" and the words "in force in British Burma" were substituted for "passed by the Governor-General of India in Council" by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

Extension of Code to extra-territorial offences.

4. The provisions of this Code apply also to any offence committed by—

(1) any Native Indian subject¹ of Her Majesty in any place without and beyond British India;²

(2) any other British subject within the territories of any Native Prince or Chief in India ;

(3) any servant of the Queen,³ whether a British subject or not, within the territories of any Native Prince or Chief in India ;

(4) any person on any ship or aircraft registered in British India wherever it may be.

Explanation.—In this section the word "offence" includes every act committed outside British India which, if committed in British India, would be punishable under this Code.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section shows the extent to which the Code now applies to offences committed outside British India. When the Indian Penal Code was passed, Parliament had only conferred on the Indian Legislature the power of dealing with extra-territorial offences where the offence was committed by a servant of Government. But since 1860 Parliament has conferred various extra-territorial powers on the Indian Legislature. It is right and convenient that in the case of a Code like the Indian Penal Code, the extent of its extra-territorial operation should appear on the face of the Code itself.²⁰

Clauses (1), (2) and (3) were enacted by Act IV of 1898. Clause (4) has been added by the Offences on Ships and Aircraft Act (IV of 1940).

Where an offence has been committed in British territory the nationality of the offender does not, of itself, prevent him from being subject to the law of British India and the jurisdiction of British Indian Courts, and the locality of the offence is unimportant. But when the offence has been committed beyond the limits of British India it becomes necessary to ascertain whether the accused is or is not (a) a Native Indian subject of His Majesty, or (b) a British subject, or (c) a servant of the Crown.

Clause 1.—Under this clause Native Indian subjects of His Majesty the King-Emperor are triable in British India for offences committed by them at any place out of British India.

1. ‘Native Indian subject.’—These words mean only native subjects de jure and not de facto. Occasional residences in British territory cannot be taken to render a person who is not de jure a subject, a subject for the purpose of criminal jurisdiction being exercised over him for an act committed in a foreign territory, which, if committed within British territory, would have been an offence cognizable by British Courts.²¹ The term ‘Native Indian subject of His Majesty’ does not include ‘servants of His Majesty.’ It has been so held by the Bombay High Court in a case in which the accused was a talati in the British territory but his family belonged to a village in the Baroda State and he was born there. His services were lent by the British Government to the Cambay State. While serving there he took bribes and was convicted by the First Class Magistrate of Ahmedabad within whose jurisdiction he was found and arrested. It was held that the accused was not a ‘Native Indian subject of His Majesty’ within the meaning of s. 188 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and that as ‘servant of the Queen’ the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to try him for an offence committed in a foreign State.²²

The legislative authority of the Government of India is expressly declared to extend to all Native Indian subjects of His Majesty, without and beyond as well as within British India, by s. 65(I) (c) of the Government of India Act, 1915.²³

2. ‘British India.’—The General Clauses Act²⁴ says that ‘British India’ shall mean all territories and places within His Majesty’s dominions which are for the time being governed by His Majesty through the Governor-General of India or through any Governor or officer subordinate to the Governor-General of India.²⁴

The word ‘India’ means British India together with all territories of any Indian Ruler under the suzerainty of His Majesty, all territories under the suzerainty of such an Indian Ruler, the tribal areas, and any other territories which His Majesty in Council may declare to be part of India.²⁵

Clause 2.—Under this clause any European British subject who commits an offence within the territories of any Indian Prince or Chief in India is triable in British India. If such a person commits an offence within the French or Portuguese territory in India he cannot be tried in British India.

Clause 3.—This clause gives jurisdiction to try servants of His Majesty, whether British or Indian, for offences committed by them in the territories of any Indian Prince or Chief in India.

3. ‘Servant of the Queen.’—See s. 14, infra. The legislative authority of the Government of India is expressly declared to extend to “all Servants of the Government of India within the Dominions of Princes and States in Alliance with Her Majesty”.¹ The servant may be a Native Indian subject or a European British subject or a foreigner. A person, who is not a British subject, is not ordinarily bound by the law of British India and is not subject to the jurisdiction of its Courts in respect of an act done by him outside British India. But an exception is created in the case of a servant of the Crown in respect of offences committed by him in the territories of any Indian Prince. For such offences, a servant of the Crown, whether he is a British subject or not, is liable to be tried in British India.

Clause 4.—This clause has been introduced so as to extend the operation of the Code to offences committed outside British India (a) by foreigners, and (b) by British subjects other than Indian British subjects, on aircrafts and ships registered in British India.^{1a}

Crimes committed outside British India.—Where an offence is committed beyond the limits of British India but the offender is found within its limits two contingencies arise :—

(I) The offender may be given up for trial in the country where the offence was committed (extradition).

(II) The offender may be tried in British India (extra-territorial or ex-territorial jurisdiction).

(1) Extradition.—Extradition means the surrender of a fugitive offender by one State to another in which the offender is liable to be punished or has been convicted. The law of extradition is founded upon the broad principle that it is to the interest of civilized communities that crimes, acknowledged to be such, should not go unpunished, and it is part of the comity of nations that one State should afford to another every assistance towards bringing persons guilty of such crimes to justice.² The procedure for securing the extradition from British India depends upon the scene of an offence. The scene of the offence committed outside British India may be—

(1) Any of the Indian States in which the Crown Representative has a power and jurisdiction through a Political Agent ;

(2) a Foreign State ; or

(3) Some British possession.

(1) Before the passing of the Foreign Jurisdiction and Extradition Act (XXI of 1879), extradition, as between the British Government and some of the Indian States, was governed by virtue of special treaties.³ "But such treaties have become obsolete owing to the passing of the above Act which afforded a much quicker remedy." Many of the Indian States have by subsequent agreements given up their rights under treaties after the Act came into operation. This Act has been substituted by the Indian Extradition Act, XV of 1903. Chapter III of this Act lays down the procedure for surrender of fugitive criminals to States other than Foreign States. The procedure varies according as there is or is not an extradition treaty with the State concerned. If there is such a treaty the procedure in Chapter III must be followed subject to the provisions of the treaty (vide s. 18). If there is no treaty, the procedure laid down in Chapter III will prevail. The Indian States come under the class of States dealt with in Chapter III and the procedure laid down in that Chapter will apply to them, except in so far as it may have been modified or superseded by the provisions of a treaty (if any) with the State concerned. Section 7 says : "Where an extradition offence [i.e. any such offence as is described in the first schedule of the Indian Extradition Act] has been committed or is supposed to have been committed by a person, not being a European British subject, in the territories of any State not being a Foreign State, and such person escapes into or is in British India, and the Political Agent in or for such State issues a warrant, addressed to the District Magistrate of any district in which such person is believed to be, or if such person is believed to be in any Presidency-town, to the Chief Presidency Magistrate of such town, for his arrest and delivery at a place and to a person or authority indicated in the warrant, such Magistrate shall act in pursuance of such warrant and may give directions accordingly".⁴ The Political Agent is not empowered by this Act to demand the extradition of a European British subject. Such a person will be dealt with under s. 188 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Such requisition must come through the Political Agent for such State if there is any.

Magistrates in British India may issue warrants to arrest persons having committed offences in Indian States on such information or complaint and on such evidence as would justify the issue of a warrant if the offence had been committed within the local limits of his jurisdiction, and surrender them to the States within whose limits the offences are committed even without a requisition (s. 10).

² Per Lord Russell, C. J., in Arton, [1896] Q. B. 108.

³ See Aitchison's Treaties and Sunnuds, and Lee Warner's Native States of India, p. 337.

⁴ A District Magistrate who is addressed with a view to execution of a warrant issued by a Political Agent of a Native State under this section must act in pursuance of such warrant and has no authority to ascertain whether a prima facie case exists against the accused or not : Gyan Chand, (1903) P. R. No. 8 of 1909.

(2) Where the scene of offence is some Foreign State (i.e. a State to which, for the time being, the English Extradition Acts, 1870⁵ and 1873⁶ apply) the fugitive criminal may, if the Central Government thinks fit and the offence is one of the offences mentioned in the first schedule of the Indian Extradition Act (XV of 1903) and is not of a political character, be surrendered on a requisition.⁷

In order to constitute an offence of a political character, there must be two or more parties in the State, each seeking to impose the Government of their own choice on the other, and that, if the offence is committed by one side or the other in pursuance of that object, it is a political offence, otherwise not.⁸

If the foreign State is not of the above description, then there is no Act, or provision in any Act, for the giving up of a foreign subject, found in British India, who has committed a crime in that State. Since the passing of the Extradition Acts 1870 to 1895⁹ Great Britain has entered into extradition treaties with various foreign States (mostly in Europe and America) embodying their provisions by Orders in Council. Such are the Portuguese Treaty Act (IV of 1880) and the Treaty with France (1909).¹⁰ The East Indian possessions of France having been excluded from the Extradition Treaty of 1876, and not being States or parts of a State to which the Extradition Acts of 1870 & 1873 apply, are held to be not a foreign State within the meaning of the Indian Extradition Act. In a Calcutta case an accused who had taken shelter in British India after committing an offence at Chandernagore was extradited in virtue of the Treaty with France of 1850.¹¹ Similarly, the Government of India delivered up to the Government of Pondicherry a British Indian subject who had committed theft within the French territory.¹² In the case of some foreign Asiatic States, usage, sufferance or acquiescence has given ex-territorial jurisdiction to British Courts.

The procedure for surrender of fugitive criminals to Foreign States is laid down in Chapter II of the Indian Extradition Act which has been declared a part of the English Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vic., c. 52) by an Order in Council dated March 7, 1904.

(3) The question of the surrender of fugitive offenders between the various possessions of the King Emperor is governed by the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881.¹³ Where a person accused of having committed an offence specified in s. 9 of this Act, or s. 19(d) of the Indian Extradition Act (viz., treason, or any other offence punishable with rigorous imprisonment for a term of twelve months or more, or with any greater punishment) in one part of His Majesty's dominions has left that part, such person, if found in another part of His Majesty's dominions, shall be liable to be apprehended and returned in manner provided by the Fugitive Offenders Act to the part from which he is a fugitive. Section 32 of the Fugitive Offenders Act provides that if the legislature of a British possession passes any Act or Ordinance for the purpose of carrying into effect its provisions, an Order in Council may be made that such Act or Ordinance shall be recognised and given effect to throughout His Majesty's dominions and on the high seas. In the case of British India, this power has been exercised by the Order in Council dated March 7, 1904, recognizing Chapter IV of the Indian Extradition Act, 1903, and declaring that it should be given effect to throughout His Majesty's dominions and on the high seas, as if it were part of the Fugitive Offenders Act. When a fugitive offender has fled into British India from some other British possession and he is to be surrendered, the law applicable will be the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, read with Chapter IV of the Indian Extradition Act.

(II) Extra-territorial jurisdiction.—The British Indian Courts are empowered to try offences committed out of British India either on (A) Land; or (B) High Seas.

(A) Land.—By virtue of ss. 3 and 4 of the Penal Code, and s. 188 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, local Courts can take cognizance of offences committed beyond the territories of British India. Several Acts of Parliament also confer similar jurisdiction. The High Courts are empowered by their Charters to try European British subjects and servants of the King for offences committed in the territories of Indian Princes.¹⁴ If the offender is a British Indian subject then he may be tried no matter where he commits the act which is an offence under the Code (vide the Explanation). The act alleged to have been done must amount to an offence punishable under the Code.¹⁵ Where the Court is dealing with an act committed outside British India by an Indian subject which would be an offence punishable under the Code if it has been committed in British India, this section, as it now exists, constitutes the act an offence, and it can be dealt with under s. 188 of the Criminal Procedure Code.¹⁶

Section 188 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides :—

“When a Native Indian subject of Her Majesty commits an offence at any place without and beyond the limits of British India, or when any British subject commits an offence in the territories of any Native Prince or Chief in India, or when a servant of the Queen (whether a British subject or not) commits an offence in the territories of any Native Prince or Chief in India, he may be dealt with in respect of such offence as if it had been committed at any place within British India at which he may be found :

Provided that notwithstanding anything in any of the preceding sections of this Chapter no charge as to any such offence shall be inquired into in British India unless the Political Agent, if there is one, for the territory in which the offence is alleged to have been committed, certifies that, in his opinion, the charge ought to be inquired into in British India :¹⁷ and, where there is no Political Agent, the sanction of the Provincial Government shall be required.”

The first part of this section refers to offences said to have been committed in any territory and not to offences committed on the high seas.¹⁸

The word ‘found’ in the section must be taken to mean, not where a person is discovered, but where he is actually present.¹⁹ A man brought into a place against his will can be said to be found there.²⁰ In the Nasik Conspiracy case the question arose whether the Special Tribunal had power to try one of the accused who had escaped at Marseilles from the custody of police-officers, charged with the duty of bringing him from London to Bombay, but was re-arrested there and brought to Bombay and committed for trial by the Special Magistrate at Nasik. It was held that where the accused was in the country and was charged with an offence under the Penal Code it would not avail him to say that he was brought there illegally from a foreign country.²¹ Where a foreign subject, though irregularly arrested in his own country, has been validly surrendered by the authorities of that country to the trying Court in British India, the proceedings are perfectly regular and in order. The State of Jind ceded full powers to the British Government over lands in the State occupied by the Southern Punjab Railway. The accused charged with a murder committed in a train of the said railway while running through Jind, was arrested by the British Indian Police in a part of the State not ceded but subsequently he was formally extradited and handed over to the authorities of the Rohtak District who placed him for trial before the Court of the Deputy Commissioner, Rohtak, which was the Court having criminal jurisdiction over the railway lands in Jind. It was held that the trial was perfectly in order and was in no way vitiated by any illegality in the accused’s arrest.²²

Native State, and was discovered in the territory of another Native State, and from there brought down or came of his own accord to Ahmedabad. A certificate was granted by the Political Agent that the offence ought to be inquired into in British India. It was held that the Sessions Court at Ahmedabad was competent to try the accused.²³

Where no certificate obtained under s. 188 of Criminal Procedure Code.—

A minor girl (under sixteen years) was taken by the accused from Sholapur to Tuljapur (foreign territory), and there dedicated to the goddess Amba, with intent or knowing it to be likely that she would be used for purposes of prostitution. The accused was convicted of an offence under s. 372 by the District Magistrate of Sholapur. It was held that as the offence of the disposal of the minor took place out of British India, the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to try the offence in the absence of a certificate of the Political Agent or the sanction of the Local Government as required by s. 188, Criminal Procedure Code.²⁴ A bullock was stolen in British Indian territory. Two months after the theft it was sold by the accused in the Idar State territory. The accused was convicted under s. 411. It was held that he could not be so convicted in the absence of a certificate from the Political Agent under s. 188 of the Criminal Procedure Code.²⁵ Where a District Magistrate instituted criminal proceedings in British India against a Native Indian subject, in respect of certain offences committed by him in French territory, without a certificate under s. 188, Criminal Procedure Code, 1882, it was held that although the Magistrate was the Political Agent who might have certified under that section, the proceedings were void for want of such certificate.¹ The Allahabad High Court has similarly held that the absence of the certificate of the Political Agent is an absolute bar to the trial.²

The accused enticed away a married girl, under sixteen years, from the house of her father, where she was temporarily staying, in the territory of the Maharaja of Kashmir. The girl was made to leave her home on a deceitful message, and was subsequently persuaded to go away with the accused. The accused induced her to file a petition at Gujarat, in the British territory, to the effect that she was without a guardian and was going to settle there to practise prostitution. He also rented a shop for her to carry on the said profession. No certificate was obtained from the Political Agent, but no objection was taken on behalf of the accused in the lower Court. The former Chief Court of the Punjab held (1) that, as the girl was induced to leave her home in consequence of a deceitful message and persuaded to go away with the accused, who actually seduced her with an intent to illicit intercourse, the offence committed was covered by s. 366 of the Code; (2) that the objection to the defect arising from the want of a certificate was made too late and the trial of the case without a certificate was, therefore, an irregularity which was cured by s. 537, Criminal Procedure Code, no prejudice having been alleged or proved.³

Subsequent annexation or transfer of the territory where the offence is committed.—A person, after having committed dacoity attended with murder, absconded to Bhootan, which was subsequently annexed by the British Government. It was held that he could be tried and convicted for the offence by the British Courts.⁴ Similarly, where certain persons were charged with committing an offence at a place in British India and committed to a Court of Session and the place where the offence was committed became part of a Native State subsequently, it was held that the British Courts were not deprived of jurisdiction inasmuch as at the time of the transfer of the place where the offence had been committed the accused were in British India in custody in point of law, of a Court of competent jurisdiction.⁵

Breach of contract under Act XIII of 1859.—The accused, having contracted in a foreign territory to labour for the complainant in the British territory, broke his contract. He was arrested in the foreign territory, brought into the British territory and tried there. It was held that the British Court had no jurisdiction, "both the contract and the breach having taken place in foreign territory".⁶ The accused, having received an advance of money from the complainant, contracted to labour for him in a foreign territory. The accused broke the contract, for which he was prosecuted in British India. It was held that the British Court could not entertain the case.⁷

Jurisdiction over European British subjects in Indian States.—Criminal law and procedure of British India is applicable to British subjects in the territories outside British India in which jurisdiction is exercised by the Governor-General in Council.⁸ In exercise of the powers conferred by s. 190, sub-s. (1), of the Government of India Act, 1915 (5 & 6 Geo. V, c. 61), the Governor-General in Council has issued the following notification.

I. The Governor-General in Council is pleased to direct that original and appellate criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects of His Majesty for the time being within the territories of the States of India named below shall, until the Governor-General in Council otherwise orders, be exercised by the High Courts of Judicature established at Fort William in Bengal, Madras, Bombay, Allahabad, Patna, Lahore and Nagpur respectively, as follows⁹ :—

Acts done within British as well as foreign territory.—A person who is a British subject is liable to be tried by the Courts of this country for acts done by him, partly within and partly without the British territories, provided the acts amount together to an offence under the Code.¹⁷

(B) High Seas.—Admiralty jurisdiction.—The jurisdiction to try offences committed on the high seas is known as admiralty jurisdiction. It is founded on the principle that a ship on the High seas is a floating island belonging to the nation whose flag she is flying. It extends over British vessels, not only when they are sailing on the high seas, but also when they are in the rivers of a foreign territory at a place below bridges, where the tide ebbs and flows, and where great ships go. It makes no difference whether the ship is made fast to the bottom of the river by anchor and cable, or to its side by ropes from the quay.¹⁸ The admiralty jurisdiction extends over British ships although they may be at a spot where the municipal authorities of a foreign country might exercise concurrent jurisdiction, if invoked. Ever since the time of Richard II, this jurisdiction has extended to where great ships go as part of their voyage for the purposes of trading, and to all persons, whether British subjects, or foreigners, who happen to be on board such ships, so as to be entitled to the protection of English law.¹⁹ It makes no difference whether the offender comes voluntarily on board the British ship or is brought and detained there against his will; nor whether he comes voluntarily within the jurisdiction of the particular Court by which he is tried, or is brought within that jurisdiction against his will.²⁰ If the ship is a British ship and sailing under the British flag the Court will have jurisdiction, and no proof of the register of the vessel is necessary.²¹ It is sufficient to show orally that she belongs to British owners, and carries the British flag.²² If a ship is registered as a British ship and sailing under the British flag, but the owner is not a natural-born British subject, the admiralty jurisdiction will not extend to offences committed on board such ship.²³ If the owner is a British subject the jurisdiction will extend to all offences committed thereon, whether the offenders be British subjects or foreigners. If a foreigner inflicts a blow on another foreigner in a foreign vessel on the high seas, and the person so struck in a few days afterwards lands in England and dies there, the homicide is not cognizable by English Courts.²⁴

As to the limits of the admiralty jurisdiction, East, in his treatise on the Pleas of the Crown,²⁵ says that this jurisdiction does not extend to any river, creek, or port within the body of a county. "The only difficulty which ever occurs is with respect to what shall be considered as the line of demarcation between the county and the high sea. Upon the open sea-shore it is past dispute that the common law and the admiralty have alternate jurisdiction between high and low water mark. But in harbours or below the bridges in great rivers near the sea, which are partly inclosed by the land, the question is often more a matter of fact than of law, and determinable by local evidence. There are, however, some general rules laid down upon this point, which it would be improper altogether to omit. It is plain that the admiral can have no jurisdiction in any rivers or arms or creeks of the sea within the bodies of counties, though within the flux and reflux of the tide: except in the particular instances before shewn, of mayhem and homicide done in great rivers beneath the bridges near the sea; which depend on the stat. 15 Ric. 2, c. 3. In general, it is said that such parts of the rivers, arms, or creeks, are deemed to be within the bodies of counties, where persons can see from one side to the other. Ld. Hale, in his treatise De Jure Maris, says, 'That arm or branch of the sea which lies within the fauces terrae, where a man may reasonably discern between shore and shore, is, or at least may be, within the body of a county.' Hawkins, however, considers the line more accurately confined by other authorities to such parts of the sea where a man standing on the side of the land may see what is done on the other." When the haven, creek or river, is within the body of a county the common law tribunals have a concurrent jurisdiction in case of murder.¹

With regard to the seashore, the ordinary criminal Courts and the Court of Admiralty have concurrent jurisdiction between high and low water-mark.²

Cases.—The accused, an English sailor, stole three chests of tea out of a British vessel, when it was lying in a river in China. It was urged that as the vessel was twenty or thirty miles from the sea, the offence was not committed on the high seas. It was held that the offence was committed within the admiralty jurisdiction.³ An American, serving on board a British ship, caused the death of another American, serving on the same ship, under circumstances amounting to manslaughter, the ship at the time being in the river Garonne, within French territory, at a place below bridges where the tide ebbed and flowed and great ships went. It was held that the ship was within the admiralty jurisdiction, and that the prisoner was rightly tried and convicted at the Central Criminal Court.⁴ A foreigner, having committed larceny in England, was followed to Hamburg by an English police-officer, who arrested him without a warrant, and brought him against his will on board an English steamer trading between Hamburg and London, and there kept him in custody in order that he might be tried for the larceny in England. During the voyage, whilst the steamer was on the high seas, he shot the officer out of malice prepense and not with a view to escape. It was held that he was guilty of murder within the admiralty jurisdiction.⁵ Certain bonds were stolen from a British ship, whilst she was lying afloat in the river at Rotterdam, moored to the quay, and were afterwards wrongfully received in England by the prisoners with a knowledge that they had been stolen. The place where the ship lay at the time of the theft was in the open river, sixteen or eighteen miles from the sea, but within the ebb and flow of the tide, and where large vessels usually lay. It did not appear who the thief was or under what circumstances he was on board the ship. It was held that the larceny took place within the admiralty jurisdiction.⁶

The accused and the deceased were foreigners, and the latter died at Liverpool from injuries inflicted by the accused on board a foreign ship on the high seas. It was held that the offence was not cognizable by English Courts.⁷ It was held, similarly, where an alien enemy, who had been a prisoner of war, and was acting as a mariner on board an English merchant ship, killed an Englishman.⁸ Where the officers and crew of a foreign vessel which was unlawfully captured as a slave-ship killed their capturers who were English, it was held that the English Courts had no jurisdiction to try them for murder.⁹

Jurisdiction of Indian High Courts.—The admiralty jurisdiction of the High Courts of Calcutta, Bombay and Madras is the same as that of the late Supreme Courts. The admiralty jurisdiction was conferred on the Supreme Courts by their respective Charters and by 33 Geo. III, c. 52, s. 156, and 53 Geo. III, c. 155, s. 110. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Bombay was that of the High Court of Admiralty in England, as it stood on the 8th December, 1928, the date of the Letters Patent creating that Court. Its jurisdiction in Vice-Admiralty was created by commission from the High Court of Admiralty in England, dated the 21st August 1843. It has been held that the jurisdiction of the Bombay High Court on its admiralty side is the same as that exercised in the Court of Admiralty in England prior to the passing of 3 & 4 Vic., c. 65, and 24 Vic., c. 10, both of which enlarged the admiralty jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in England but which did not apply to India.¹⁰ The Act for establishing High Courts in India¹¹ (24 & 25 Vic., c. 104, s. 9) provided that the High Courts of Calcutta, Bombay and Madras shall exercise all such Admiralty and Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction as may be vested in them by Letters Patent establishing them. The original Letters Patent of the Bombay High Court (1862) ordained that the High Court "shall have and exercise all such civil and maritime jurisdiction as may now be exercised by the said Supreme Court as a Court of Admiralty, or by any Judge of the said Court as Commissary to the Vice-Admiralty Court, and also such jurisdiction for the trial and adjudication of prize causes and other maritime questions, arising in India, as is now vested in any Commissioner" appointed under 39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 79, s. 25 (s. 31). The Amended Letters Patent of 1865 confirmed this jurisdiction (s. 32). The Letters Patent of the Calcutta, the Madras, the Patna and the Rangoon High Courts are also to the same effect.

Under the Colonial Courts of Admiralty (India) Act (XVI of 1891), s. 1, the High Courts at Calcutta, Bombay and Madras; the Court of the Recorder of Rangoon; the Court of the Resident at Aden; and the District Court of Karachi are declared to be Colonial Courts of Admiralty within the meaning of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890.¹² The above-mentioned Courts are therefore empowered to exercise the same jurisdiction as is vested in the Admiralty Court of England.

Offences committed on the high seas could not be tried, at first, by ordinary criminal Courts. They were only dealt with by the Admiralty Court. But now by virtue of the Admiralty Offences Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vic., c. 96) and the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vic., c. 60) such offences are triable in England as well as in India by ordinary criminal Courts, as if they were committed within the local jurisdiction of those Courts. Section 686 of the Merchant Shipping Act says: "(1) Where any person, being a British subject, is charged with having committed any offence on board any British ship on the high seas or in any foreign port or harbour or on board any foreign ship to which he does not belong, or, not being a British subject, is charged with having committed any offence on board any British ship on the high seas, and that person is found within the jurisdiction of any court in Her Majesty's dominions, which would have had cognizance of the offence if it had been committed on board a British ship within the limits of its ordinary jurisdiction, that court shall have jurisdiction to try the offence as if it had been so committed. (2) Nothing in this section shall affect the Admiralty Offences (Colonial) Act, 1849" (12 & 13 Vic., c. 96). For the purpose of giving jurisdiction under the Merchant Shipping Act, every offence shall be deemed to have been committed and every cause of complaint to have arisen either in the place in which the same actually was committed or arose, or in any place in which the offender or person complained against may be (s. 684). Where any district within which any court, justice of the peace, or other magistrate, has jurisdiction either under this Act or under any other Act or at common law for any purpose whatever is situate on the coast of any sea, or abutting on or projecting into any bay, channel, lake, river, or other navigable water, every such court, justice, or magistrate, shall have jurisdiction over any vessel being on, or lying or passing off, that coast, or being in or near that bay, channel, lake, river, or navigable water, and over all persons on board that vessel or for the time being belonging thereto, in the same manner as if the vessel or persons were within the limits of the original jurisdiction of the court, justice, or magistrate (s. 685). Section 687 declares the offences committed by British seamen at foreign ports to be within the admiralty jurisdiction. It says: "All offences against property or person committed in or at any place either ashore or afloat out of Her Majesty's dominions by any master, seaman, or apprentice who at the time when the offence is committed is, or within three months previously has been, employed in any British ship shall be deemed to be offences of the same nature respectively, and be liable to the same punishments respectively, and be inquired of, heard, tried, determined, and adjudged in the same manner and by the same courts and in the same places as if those offences had been committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England; and the costs and expenses of the prosecution of any such offence may be directed to be paid as in the case of costs and expenses of prosecutions for offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England."

By ss. 1 and 56 of 9 Geo. IV, c. 74, a special jurisdiction was conferred on the Supreme Courts and it has now passed to the High Courts. These provisions have not been repealed.

Presidency Magistrates' jurisdiction in admiralty cases.—The Bombay High Court has held that a Presidency Magistrate has authority to convict a person of an offence under the Penal Code, it having been committed in a British ship during her voyage on the high seas. The Chief Officer of a ship was charged with criminal breach of trust as a servant with respect to the passage money he received from a pilgrim during the voyage. It was held that the Presidency Magistrate could try him, and that the charge should be framed in reference to the Penal Code, and that in case of conviction the punishment should be awarded under the Code.¹³ The Calcutta High Court has dissented from this view. It has held that the High Court of Calcutta has jurisdiction, in its Original Criminal Side, under ss. 684 and 686 of the Merchant Shipping Act (57 & 58 Vic., c. 60), to try a native Indian seaman for murder or manslaughter committed on board a British vessel on the high seas, who is brought to Calcutta under custody, notwithstanding that the vessel touched, after the commission of the offence, at intermediate ports in the course of the voyage. The offence should be tried, and the charge framed, under the English law, but the procedure at the trial and the sentence must be regulated by the law of India.¹⁴

Jurisdiction of mofussil Courts.—The jurisdiction to try offences committed on the high seas was first conferred on the mofussil Courts by s. 1 of 23 & 24 Vic.,

c. 88, which extended the provisions of the Admiralty Offences Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vic., c. 96) to British India.

Section 1 of the Admiralty Offences Act provides : "If any person within any colony shall be charged with the commission of any treason, piracy, felony, robbery, murder, conspiracy, or other offence, of what nature or kind soever, committed upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place where the admiral or admirals have power, authority, or jurisdiction, or if any person charged with the commission of any such offence upon the sea, or in any such haven, river, creek, or place shall be brought for trial to any colony, then and in every such case all magistrates, justices of the peace, public prosecutors, juries, judges, courts, public officers, and other persons in such colony shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction and authorities for inquiring of, trying, hearing, determining, and adjudging such offences, and they are hereby respectively authorized, empowered, and required to institute and carry on all such proceedings for the bringing of such persons so charged as aforesaid to trial, and for and auxiliary to and consequent upon the trial of any such person for any such offence wherewith he may be charged as aforesaid, as by the law of such colony would and ought to have been had and exercised or instituted and carried on by them respectively if such offence had been committed, and such person had been charged with having committed the same, upon any waters situate within the limits of any such colony, and within the limits of the local jurisdiction of the courts of criminal justice of such colony."

Section 3 provides : "Where any person shall die in any colony of any stroke, poisoning, or hurt, such person having been feloniously stricken, poisoned, or hurt upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place where the admiral or admirals have power, authority, or jurisdiction, or at any place out of such colony, every offence committed in respect of any such case, whether the same shall amount to the offence of murder or of manslaughter, or of being accessory before the fact to murder, or after the fact to murder or manslaughter, may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in such colony in the same manner in all respects as if such offence had been wholly committed in that colony ; and that if any person in any colony shall be charged with any such offence as aforesaid in respect of the death of any person who having been feloniously stricken, poisoned, or otherwise hurt, shall have died of such stroke, poisoning, or hurt upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place where the admiral or admirals have power, authority, or jurisdiction, such offence shall be held for the purpose of this Act to have been wholly committed upon the sea."

Both these sections are extended to India by s. 1 of 23 & 24 Vic., c. 88, which says that "...the word 'colony' ... shall include and apply to every part and place heretofore under the Government of the East India Company, or which may be under the Government of Her Majesty in India, and all the provisions of the said Act shall be construed and take effect accordingly." Section 686 of the Merchant Shipping Act makes the provisions of s. 1 of 12 & 13 Vic., c. 96 (Admiralty Offences Act) applicable to India.¹⁵

Section 2 of 23 & 24 Vic., c. 88, gives the offender the right of being tried by the High Court. It provides that "where any person within any place in India is charged with the commission of any offence in respect of which jurisdiction is given by the said Act (12 & 13 Vic., c. 96), or where any person charged with the commission of any such offence is brought for trial under the said Act to any place in India, if at any time before his trial he make it appear to the Court exercising criminal jurisdiction in the place where he is so charged or brought for trial, that in case the offence charged had been committed in such place he could have been tried only in the Supreme Court of one of the three Presidencies in India, and claim to be tried by such a Supreme Court accordingly, the said Court exercising criminal jurisdiction as aforesaid shall certify the fact and claim to the Governor of such place or chief local authority thereof, and such Governor or chief local authority thereupon shall order and cause the person charged to be sent in custody to such one of the presidencies as such Governor shall think fit for trial before the Supreme Court of such presidency, and the said Supreme Court and all public officers and other persons in the presidency shall have the same jurisdiction and authorities, and proceed in the same manner in relation to the person charged with such offence, as if the same had been committed or originally charged to have been committed within the limits of the ordinary jurisdiction of such Supreme Court.”

Where a murder was committed on board a British steamer from Penang to Negapatam by a British subject, the Sessions Court of East Tanjore at Negapatam was held to have jurisdiction to try the offence.¹⁶

Law and procedure applicable to offences committed on high seas.—

Under the provisions of 12 & 13 Vic., c. 96, extended to India by 23 & 24 Vic., c. 88, persons charged with crimes on the high seas were proceeded against in the Courts of British India in the same way as if the offence had been committed upon any waters situate within the limits of British India and within the limits of the local jurisdiction of its criminal Courts, and on conviction were punished as if their crimes had been committed in England. The English law was held to be the substantive law of decision in cases made cognizable by the local tribunals by virtue of that statute.¹⁷ The Bombay High Court is of opinion that this is altered by the Colonial Courts Act (37 & 38 Vic., c. 27), s. 3, and an offence committed on the high seas should be tried and punished according to the local law.¹⁸ In a full bench case the former Chief Court of Lower Burma had adopted the same view.¹⁹ The Calcutta High Court has differed from the Bombay cases and held that the Colonial Courts Act has made no such alteration and such offence should be tried, and the charge framed, under the English law, whether the accused is a British European subject or a British Indian subject, but the procedure at the trial and the sentence must be regulated by the law of India.²⁰ Section 3 of the Courts (Colonial) Jurisdiction Act (37 & 38 Vic., c. 27) says: “When by virtue of any Act of Parliament now or hereafter to be passed, a person is tried in a court of any colony for any crime or offence committed upon the high seas or elsewhere out of the territorial limits of such colony and of the local jurisdiction of such Court, or if committed within such local jurisdiction made punishable by that Act, such person shall, upon conviction, be liable to such punishment as might have been inflicted upon him if the crime or offence had been committed within the limits of such colony and of the local jurisdiction of the Court, and to no other, anything in any Act to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided always, that if the crime or offence is a crime or offence not punishable by the law of the colony in which the trial takes place, the person shall, on conviction, be liable to such punishment (other than capital punishment) as shall seem to the Court most nearly to correspond to the punishment to which such person would have been liable in case such crime or offence had been tried in England.”

The Calcutta High Court has held that this section does not deal with the trial of the case, but with the sentence after conviction, the statute adopting the local machinery for punishment to the English definition of crime.²¹

The procedure to be followed in cases where offences are committed on the high seas is the ordinary criminal procedure.²² Three things are essential in cases of trial of offences committed on the high seas:—

- (1) The offence charged must be an offence under the English law according to the Calcutta High Court though not according to the Bombay High Court.
- (2) The trial must be conducted under the Code of Criminal Procedure.
- (3) The punishment must be regulated by the Penal Code.

Piracy.—Piracy is of two kinds, viz., piracy jure gentium and piracy by the statute law of England. Piracy jure gentium is an offence against all nations. Piracy “is only a sea-term for robbery, piracy being a robbery committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty. If any man be assaulted within that jurisdiction, and his ship or goods violently taken away without legal authority, this is robbery and piracy. If the mariners of any ship shall violently dispossess the master, and afterwards carry away the ship itself, or any of the goods, or tackle, apparel or furniture, with a felonious intention, in any place where the Lord Admiral hath, or pretends to have, jurisdiction, this is also robbery and piracy. The intention will, in these cases, appear by considering the end for which the fact was committed; and the end will be known, if the evidence shall shew you what hath been done."²³ "The offence of piracy, by common law," according to Blackstone,²⁴ "consists in committing those acts of robbery and depredation upon the high seas, which, if committed upon land, would have amounted to felony there." "To whatever country the pirate may have originally belonged, he is justiciable everywhere: his detestable occupation has made him hostis humani generis, and he cannot upon any ground claim immunity from the tribunal of his captor."²⁵ "The King of England hath not only an empire and sovereignty over the British seas, but also an undoubted jurisdiction and power, in concurrency with other princes and states, for the punishment of all piracies and robberies at sea, in the most remote parts of the world: so that if any person whatsoever, native or foreigner, Christian or Infidel, Turk or Pagan, with whose country we have no war, with whom we hold trade and correspondence, and are in amity, shall be robbed or spoiled in the Narrow Seas, the Mediterranean, Atlantic, Southern, or any other seas, or the branches thereof, either on this or the other side of the line, it is piracy within the limits of your enquiry, and the cognizance of this Court."²⁶ A pirate is one who is a source of danger to the vessels of all nations.

Actual robbery is not an essential element of the crime of piracy jure gentium. A frustrated attempt to commit a piratical robbery is equally piracy jure gentium.²

If the subjects of the same State commit robbery upon each other, upon the high seas, it is piracy. If the subjects of different States commit robbery upon each other, upon the high seas, if their respective States are in amity, it is piracy; if at enmity, it is not; for it is a general rule, that enemies can never commit piracy on each other, their depredations being deemed mere acts of hostility.³

By statutes passed at various times and still in force, many artificial offences have been created, which are to be deemed to amount to piracy.⁴

Thus by 11 Will. III, c. 7, ss. 8 and 9, 8 Geo. I, c. 24, s. 1, and 18 Geo. II, c. 30, British subjects committing hostilities against British subjects under a commission from a foreign prince or adhering to an enemy, and persons running away with or hindering defence of ships and other offenders, are punishable as pirates. By 5 Geo. IV, c. 113, s. 9, the carrying away, conveying or removing of any person upon the high seas, for the purpose of his being imported or brought into any place as a slave, or being sold or dealt with as such, or the embarking or receiving on board any person for such purpose, is made piracy.

Piracy is dealt with in several statutes, dating from 1536.⁵

The admiralty jurisdiction extends to pirates who were foreigners in the case of piracy jure gentium only.

Cases.—Several mariners on board a ship seized the captain, he not agreeing with them, and after putting him on shore, carried away the ship, and committed several piracies. It was held that the force upon the captain, and the carrying away of the ship, was piracy.⁶ But where the master of a vessel loaded goods on board at Rotterdam, consigned to Malaga, which he caused to be insured, and after he had run the goods on shore in England, the ship was burnt with intent to defraud the owners and insurers, it was held that no piracy had been committed but only a breach of trust, and that it would not be piracy to convert the goods in a fraudulent manner until the special trust was determined.⁷

Liability of foreigners in British India for offences committed outside British India.—There is no express enactment by which the Indian Legislature can assume to render foreigners subject to the criminal law of British India with reference to acts committed by them beyond the limits of British India. In the words of Chief Justice Cockburn, “no proposition of law can be more incontestable or more universally admitted than that, according to the general law of nations, a foreigner, though criminally responsible to the law of a nation not his own for acts done by him while within the limits of its territory, cannot be made responsible to its law for acts done beyond such limits :—... This rule must, however, be taken subject to this qualification, namely, that if the legislature of a particular country should think fit by express enactment to render foreigners subject to its law with reference to offences committed beyond the limits of its territory, it would be incumbent on the Courts of such country to give effect to such enactment, leaving it to the state to settle the question of international law with the governments of other nations.”⁸ The acts of a foreigner committed by him in the territory beyond the limits of British India do not, therefore, constitute an offence against the Penal Code of British India, and, consequently, a foreigner cannot be held criminally responsible under that Code by the tribunals of that country for acts committed by him beyond its territorial limits. It is only for acts done when the person doing them is within the territory over which the authority of the British law extends, that the subjects of a foreign State owe obedience to that law and can be made amenable to its jurisdiction. Thus, when it is sought to punish a person, who is not a British subject, as an offender in respect of a certain act, the question is not ‘where was the act committed,’ but ‘was the person at the time, when the act was done, within the territory of British India.’ For if he was not, the act is not an offence, the doer of it is not liable to be punished as an offender, and he is, therefore, not subject to the jurisdiction of criminal Courts.⁹ A foreign subject, resident in a foreign territory, instigating the commission of an offence which, in consequence, is committed in British territory, is not amenable to the jurisdiction of a British Court if the instigation has not taken place in British India.¹⁰

But if a foreigner in a foreign territory initiates an offence which is completed within British territory, he is, if found within British territory, liable to be tried by the British Court within whose jurisdiction the offence was completed.¹¹

There is nothing in s. 188, Criminal Procedure Code, which contravenes the general rule of international law that no Court has jurisdiction over foreigners in respect of offences committed in a foreign State.¹²

An Act will not be construed as applying to foreigners in respect to acts done by them outside the dominions of the sovereign power enacting. That is a rule based on international law, by which one sovereign power is bound to respect the subjects and the rights of all other sovereign powers outside its own territory.¹³

Cases.—Dacoity in foreign territory.—Where the accused committed dacoity in the Patiala State but were found in British territory where they had stayed for three years, it was held that they were not liable to be tried by a British Court as they were foreign subjects and the offence was committed in a foreign territory.¹⁴

Kidnapping in foreign territory.—A girl was enticed away in Faridkot State from the lawful guardianship of her husband by the accused, who were foreign subjects, and was found being conveyed by them by rail from that State to a station in the Bhawalpur State at the railway station of Abdhar in the British territory.

not liable to be punished under the Penal Code by a Court in British India for acts committed in British India, he being at the time of such commission in foreign territory, even if he afterwards was in British India: Musst. Kishen Kour, (1878) P. R. No. 20 of 1878.

It was held that, as the act of kidnapping was complete outside British India, the British Courts, had no jurisdiction to try and convict the accused.¹⁵

Murder on high seas.—The accused, a subject of an Indian State, was charged with the offence of attempt to murder, on board a ship belonging to him on the high seas some eighteen miles off the coast of Kanara, British territory. He was tried for the offence by a Magistrate in the British territory. It was held that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to try the accused as the accused was not a British subject and the offence was committed on a non-British ship on the high seas outside the territorial limits.¹⁶

Abetment in foreign territory of forgery committed in British India.—The accused who lived at Cambay, an Indian State, conspired with his partner A, at Cambay, to get a valuable security forged by a professional forger at Umreth, a place within British territory. To facilitate forgery, the accused sent an account book with A, who proceeded to Umreth and had the book forged there accordingly. The accused was committed for trial to the Sessions Court on a charge of abetment of forgery of a valuable security (ss. 467 and 109.). The Sessions Judge, being of opinion that the British Court had no jurisdiction to try the accused, referred the case to the High Court for an order quashing the commitment. It was held that the British Court had jurisdiction to try the accused, inasmuch as his offence was not wholly committed within Cambay territory but having been initiated there was continued and completed within British territory.¹⁷

Jurisdiction.—Over non-British subjects who have committed offences beyond the limits of British India, the criminal Courts of British India have no jurisdiction, except that conferred by s. 4 (3) of the Code and by ss. 4 and 10 of the Indian Extradition Act (XV of 1903). These sections only empower Magistrates to arrest, and, if so ordered by Government, to inquire into the truth of the accusation made.

Amendment.—Burma.—For clauses (1), (2) and (3) the following were substituted: “(1) any British subject domiciled in Burma, when committed in any place without and beyond British Burma; (2) any other British subject or any servant of the Crown, when committed within any part of Burma ‘outside British Burma’; and the illustrations were omitted by the Government of Burma (Adaption of Laws) Order, 1937.

PRACTICE.

Evidence in cases of piracy.—Prove (1) that the accused has committed acts which amount to robbery (see s. 390, infra), or to frustrated attempt to commit it.

(2) That such acts have been committed within the jurisdiction of admiralty.

Charge.—When a person is tried before a Court which would not have jurisdiction but for special circumstances, the Court should specify in the charge those circumstances.

The charge should run thus:—

I (name and office of Magistrate) hereby charge you as follows—

That you, being a Native Indian subject (or British subject or servant) of His Majesty the King-Emperor, on or about the—day of, at—, without and beyond British India, did—and thereby committed an offence punishable under ss. 4 and—of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

If the accused is a British subject or servant of the King-Emperor and has committed an offence within the dominions of an Indian Prince, the second paragraph in the above charge would run thus:—

That you, being a British subject (or a servant) of His Majesty the King-Emperor, on or about the—day of—, at—, within the dominions of—did, etc.

If the offence comes under the admiralty jurisdiction, the second paragraph of the above charge would generally be as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, then being a British subject (omit these words if the accused is a foreigner) on board the British ship—, on the High seas, did—, and thereby committed an offence punishable, etc.

5. Nothing in this Act is intended to repeal,¹ vary, suspend, or affect any of the provisions of the Statute 3 & 4 William IV, Chapter 85, or of any Act of Parliament passed after that Statute in anywise affecting the East India Company or British India, or the inhabitants thereof; or any of the provisions of any Act for punishing mutiny and desertion of officers, soldiers, sailors or airmen² in the service of Her Majesty, or of any special or local law.³

COMMENT.

This section acts as a saving clause to s. 2. Though “the Code was intended to be a general one, it was not thought desirable to make it exhaustive, and hence offences defined by local and special laws were left out of the Code, and merely declared to be punishable as theretofore.”¹⁸ “Section 2... repealed all existing penal enactments in force on the date from which the Code was to come into operation. Then the effect of section 5 was to qualify this general repeal and to declare that, notwithstanding it, offences defined by special and local laws should continue to be punishable as theretofore... If, therefore, a person were required to ascertain from the Penal Code what acts and omissions are punishable in British India as offences, he would properly answer that it appeared from section 2 and section 5, that all acts or omissions contrary to the provisions of the Code itself or the provisions of special and local laws and some other laws enumerated in section 5, and these alone and none others, were punishable as offences.”¹⁹ The preamble to the Code and ss. 1 and 2, read with this section, prescribe that all acts or omissions contrary to the provisions of the Code, or of special and local laws enumerated in this section and none others, are punishable as offences.²⁰

‘Statute 3 & 4 William IV, Chapter 85’ was the Government of India Act, 1833, which has now been repealed in part.

1. ‘Repeal.’—Under the General Clauses Act (X of 1897), s. 6, where an Act repeals any enactment then, unless a different intention appears, the repeal shall not revive anything not in force or existing at the time at which the repeal takes effect, or affect the previous operation of any enactment so repealed or anything duly done or suffered thereunder, or affecting penalty, forfeiture or punishment incurred in respect of any offence committed against any enactment so repealed, or affect any investigation, legal proceeding or remedy in respect of any such penalty, forfeiture or punishment; and any such penalty or forfeiture or punishment may be imposed as if the repealing Act had not been passed. Section 6A says that where any Central Act repeals any enactment by which the text of any Central Act was amended by the express omission, insertion, or substitution of any matter, then, unless a different intention appears, the repeal shall not affect the continuance of any such amendment made by the enactment so repealed and in operation at the time of such repeal, section 4 of the Repealing and Amending Act (XXV of 1942) says that the repeal by that Act of any enactment shall not affect any Act... in which such enactment has been applied, incorporated or referred to.^{20a} The effect of repealing a statute is to obliterate it as completely from the records as if it had never been passed. But the effect of an Act or Order which is superseded is not to obliterate it altogether. An Act or Order effects the same purposes as an earlier one by

2. 'Officers, soldiers, sailors or airmen.'—The laws relating to Army and Navy here referred to are the several Acts and Articles of War, passed from time to time to punish offences committed by military and naval men. The Code does not affect their provisions. See the Army Act (44 & 45 Vic., c. 58) and the Air Force Act (7 & 8 Geo. V, c. 51), as continued and amended by subsequent annual Army and Air Force Acts, which provide a special procedure for the trial of offenders by a Court-martial, and which give a list of persons subject to military law; the Indian Army Act (VIII of 1911); and the Indian Air Force Act (XIV of 1932).

3. 'Special or local law.'—No special or local law (ss. 41 and 42) is repealed, varied, suspended, or affected by the enactment of the Code. Although an offence is expressly made punishable by a special or local law, yet it will be punishable under the Penal Code, if the facts come within the definitions of the Code.²¹ The distinction between a statute creating a new offence with a particular penalty and a statute enlarging the ambit of an existing offence by including new acts within it with a particular penalty is well settled. In the former case the new offence is punishable by the new penalty only, in the latter, it is punishable also by all such penalties as were applicable before the Act to the offence in which it is included.²² The principle is that where a new offence is created and the particular manner in which proceedings should be taken is laid down, then proceedings cannot be taken in any other way.²³ No prosecution under the Code is admissible, if it appears upon the whole frame of the special Act that it was intended to be complete in itself, and to be enforced only by the penalties created by it,²⁴ but in the absence of anything in the special Act to exclude the operation of the Code, an intention on the part of the Legislature to exclude it should not be inferred.²⁵ The principle that where a particular set of acts or omissions constitute an offence under the general law and also under a special law the prosecution should be under the special law, is confined to cases where the offences are coincident or practically so.¹ Where the offence falls strictly within the provisions of a section of a special Act and does not go beyond it, it would be more appropriate to prosecute the offender and convict him under that special Act, rather than fall back upon a more general law which prescribes a heavier penalty.² Where there is a conflict between a special Act and a general Act the provisions of the special Act prevail.³ However, a person cannot be punished under both the Penal Code and a special law for the same offence,⁴ and it is ordinarily desirable that the sentence should be passed under the special Act.⁵ For, it is presumed that the Legislature intends that the special form of punishment is appropriate to special cases. The General Clauses Act⁶ provides that 'where an act or omission constitutes an offence under two or more enactments, then the offender shall be liable to be prosecuted and punished under either or any of those enactments, but shall not be liable to be punished twice for the same offence". Where the accused is guilty of a specific offence under the Indian Penal Code he should be convicted under the Code if the punishment under the special Act is not adequate.⁷ The Allahabad High Court has held that a conviction of theft under s. 379 of the Penal Code in respect of a certain amount of crude opium is no bar to a subsequent trial and conviction of the convict under s. 9 of the Indian Opium Act, 1878.⁸

Punishment for contempt under common law.—This section does not affect the common law principles introduced into the Presidency-towns when the late Supreme Courts were established. The High Courts in the Provinces have power to punish the offence of contempt on a summary proceeding in relation to proceedings before them not by virtue of the Penal Code but by virtue of the common law of England.⁹ The power of the High Court to commit for any contempt of itself is inherent in the Court and arises from the fact that it is a Court of Record.¹⁰ This power has not been taken away or in anywise limited by the Contempt of Courts Act (XII of 1926).¹¹ Where the High Court considers that a person has committed contempt of itself, although the contempt may have been committed outside its jurisdiction it can deal with that person, if he were within its jurisdiction. There is, however, no power in the High Court to arrest for contempt of Court a person outside its jurisdiction.¹² The Allahabad High Court has held that the Court has such power. Where the contempt has been committed within the territorial jurisdiction of the High Court in India, such Court is competent to issue process to secure the attendance of the offender wherever he may be residing in British India.^{12a}

All publications which offend against the dignity of the Court, or are calculated to prejudice the course of justice will constitute contempt. Offences of this nature are of three kinds, namely, those which (1) scandalise the Court; or (2) abuse the parties concerned in causes there; or (3) prejudice mankind against persons before the cause is heard. Under the first head fall libels on the integrity of the Court, its Judges, officers, or proceedings: under the second and third heads anything which tends to excite prejudice against the parties, or their litigation while it is pending.¹³ Thus, a person is guilty of contempt of Court if, in respect of a pending proceeding, he publishes a writing (a) in which he assumes the truth of certain facts connected directly or indirectly with matters awaiting the decision of the Court; or (b) in which he attacks the conduct and the character of the parties to the proceeding or similarly attacks a person who is one of the principal figures and a witness in the proceeding though not a party to it; or (c) in which he forecasts the probable judgment of the Court and makes the comment that law and justice would be defeated by such judgment.¹⁴ A full bench of the Madras High Court laid down: (i) To comment on a case which is sub judice or to suggest that a Court should take a certain course in respect of a matter before it constitutes contempt and honesty of motive cannot remove it from this category. The criterion is not whether the Court will be influenced, but whether the action complained of is calculated to prejudice the course of justice. (ii) To comment on proceedings which are imminent but not yet launched in Court with knowledge of the fact is as much a contempt as comment on a case actually launched. (iii) A discussion in a newspaper of the rights and wrongs of a case when pending before a Court is improper and constitutes contempt of Court. But this does not mean that reference cannot be made to pending cases or that items of news which are connected with pending cases should not be published.¹⁵ A person does not commit contempt of Court by publishing comment on a case in which proceedings have not actually commenced, if the person has no knowledge or has no reasonable ground for believing that such proceedings are imminent.^{15a} Where in an article in a newspaper it was stated, "we doubt whether in any case where opinions count, any subordinate Magistrate will give a judgment contrary to what he believes the Government of the day has decided," it was held that this amounted to gross contempt of Court.¹⁶ Comment in a newspaper upon a pending case, which has any tendency to interfere with the due course of justice, or to prejudice the public against persons who are on their trial, is technically a contempt of Court.¹⁷ Aspersions cast upon an advocate, with reference to the conduct of his case, which tend to embarrass him in the further conduct of his client's case, is contempt of Court.¹⁸ It is rare for words used in the course of argument, however irrelevant, to amount to a contempt when they relate to an opponent, whether counsel or litigant. If in the course of a case a person persists in a line of conduct or use of language in spite of the ruling of the presiding Judge, he may very properly be adjudged guilty of contempt of Court. If a litigant or an advocate threatened or attempted violence on his opponent or used language so outrageous and provocative as to be likely to lead to a brawl in Court, the offence of contempt is committed.^{18a} Newspapers which publish copies or resumes of pleadings and similar documents in pending suits do so at the risk of committing contempt of Court.¹⁹ Any such act or writing tending to undermine the authority of Courts of justice, or to influence the result of pending litigation is contempt of Court and a most serious offence.²⁰ When during the pendency of a suit in which the genuineness of a will was seriously disputed, the editor of a newspaper published a certified copy of the will as a paid advertisement, and the object of the publication was to make the public believe that it was genuine, it was held that the editor was guilty of contempt of Court.²¹ The essence of the offence of contempt of Court is conduct calculated to produce an atmosphere of prejudice in the midst of which the proceedings must go on, even where the proceedings do not involve trial by jury and no one would imagine that the mind of the Magistrates or Judges charged with the case would or could not be induced thereby to swerve from the straight course.²² 'Contempt of Court' may include conduct which, while it cannot directly influence a Judge's mind, is calculated to affect the conduct of parties to proceedings, and the Court's jurisdiction to commit for contempt is not confined to cases in which its orders may directly be affected.²³ "It is indeed difficult and almost impossible to frame a comprehensive and complete definition of contempt of Court. The law of contempt covers the whole field of litigation itself. The real end of a judicial proceeding, civil or criminal, is to ascertain the true facts and dispense justice. Various persons have their respective contributions to make in the proper fulfilment of that task. They are necessarily the Judges or the Magistrates, the parties to the proceedings, or their agents or pleaders or advocates, the witnesses and the ministerial or menial staff of the Court. All these persons can well be described as the limbs of the judicial proceeding. For proper administration of justice it is essential that all these persons are, in the performance of their respective duties, ensured such fullness of freedom as is fair and legitimate. Anything that tends to curtail or impair the freedom of the limbs of the judicial proceeding must of necessity result in perverting the due administration of law and interfering with the course of justice. It must, therefore, be held to constitute contempt of Court.²⁴ Criticism of a capital sentence case pending confirmation by the High Court may amount to contempt although no appeal has been preferred at the date of such criticism.²⁵ Proceedings for punishing contempt are taken not with a view to protect either the Court as a whole or the individual Judges of the Court from a repetition of the attack, but with a view to protect the public and specially those who either voluntarily or by compulsion are subject to the jurisdiction of the Court, from the mischief they will incur if the authority of the tribunal is undermined or impaired. The gravamen is an endeavour to shake the confidence of the public in Court.¹ The practice in proceedings to punish contempt of Court has been for the Judges who have been defamed to hear the case and to state in their judgment the facts within their knowledge or their reasons for taking a particular course of action.²

The Rangoon High Court has held that the High Court has power to deal with contempts summarily, instead of acting under s. 476 or 480 of the Code of Criminal Procedure or under O. XVI, r. 17, of the Code of Civil Procedure.³ The Court has power to punish, by commitment for contempt, a libel published while the Court is not sitting.⁴

The Lahore High Court has held that the Criminal Procedure Code does not apply to summary proceedings for punishing contempt. No application for adjournment under s. 344, Criminal Procedure Code, will be entertained because immediate action is necessary to vindicate the authority of the Court.⁵

Contempt proceedings are of a summary nature. Such proceedings are not, therefore, suitable for the decision of a hotly contested question of fact. The proceedings for contempt of Court, though not criminal, are of a quasi-criminal nature and so where there is any reasonable doubt, the person charged with contempt is entitled to the benefit of such a doubt. An honest, though mistaken, arrest, though it might interfere with the due course of justice, cannot amount to contempt. The arrest of a counsel by the police in order to prevent him from filing an application to the High Court under s. 491, Criminal Procedure Code, for the release of a detenu and appearing on behalf of the detenu or to prevent other counsel from appearing and to prevent the counsel from obtaining an order from the High Court for an interview with the detenu in the jail amounts to interference with the due course of justice and constitutes contempt of Court.^{6a}

If a person says or writes anything which amounts to contempt of Court, he is not permitted to lead evidence to establish the truth of his allegations.⁶

The Calcutta High Court had held that it had no jurisdiction to commit a person for contempt for a criminal Court in the mofussil.⁷ But the Bombay High Court was of opinion that it had such power.⁸ The Allahabad High Court in earlier cases took the same view.⁹ But in a subsequent full bench case it laid down that no power to punish for contempt of an inferior Court existed independently of the Penal Code and the Contempt of Courts Act. The inherent powers of the Supreme Court of Calcutta were not conferred on the Allahabad High Court by the Indian High Courts Act, 1861.¹⁰ The Contempt of Courts Act (XII of 1926), s. 2, has adopted the Bombay view. The Lahore High Court has held that it could take cognizance of a contempt alleged to have been committed in respect of a Court subordinate to it, notwithstanding the provisions of s. 2(3) of the Contempt of Courts Act, as the words "where such contempt is an offence punishable under the Indian Penal Code" means that the contempt must be punishable as a contempt under the Indian Penal Code and not punishable only because it otherwise is an offence.¹¹ The Patna High Court has held likewise.¹²

All other Courts including the Judicial Commissioners' Courts can only take action for contempt of Court under s. 228 of the Penal Code and s. 487 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.¹³

Where the contempt is some form of physical violence or obstruction and as such punishable by a criminal Court, the aggrieved party ought not to be allowed to invoke the special jurisdiction inherent in the Court by way of proceeding for contempt of Court. The proper place for such matters is the Magistrates' Court.¹⁴ Where the parties came to a settlement of their dispute and one of the terms of such settlement was that the defendant would not dispose of certain properties until the decree was satisfied and the terms of settlement were made part of the decree passed by the Court but before the decree was satisfied, the parties giving the undertaking mortgaged the properties, it was held that the party was guilty of contempt of Court and the breach of the undertaking was not such a trivial matter as would be beneath the dignity of the Court to notice.¹⁵

Amendment.—After the words "Her Majesty" there were the words "or of the East India Company, or of any Act for the Government of the Indian navy"; but they were repealed by Act XIV of 1870. The word "soldiers" was introduced by Act X of 1927 and the word 'sailors' by Act XXXV of 1934. The words "or airman" were introduced by Act X of 1927.

After the words "East India Company or" the words "British India" were substituted for the words "the said territories" by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937.

PRACTICE.

Jurisdiction.—Section 101 of the Mutiny Act (41 Vic., c. 10) does not deprive the civil (as opposed to military) Courts of jurisdiction over British soldiers committing offences within the territorial limits of those Courts, nor render the exercise of their jurisdiction dependent upon the sanction of the Commander-in-Chief.¹⁶

Conviction under special Act not to be quashed.—The circumstance that the act proved would also constitute an offence under a section of the Code, is no reason for quashing a conviction under a special law.¹⁷

CHAPTER II.

GENERAL EXPLANATIONS.

THIS Chapter is for the most part an elaborate interpretation clause. It is a key to the interpretation of the whole Code. The leading terms used are here defined and explained, and the meanings thus announced are steadily adhered to throughout the subsequent chapters. Sir James Stephen suggests that the object of this Chapter is to prevent captious Judges from wilfully misunderstanding the Code and cunning criminals from evading its provisions. It does not provide explanations for all cases indiscriminately, but only for those cases where difficulty may arise, when it will be necessary to refer to this Chapter to see what the meaning of the Code is.¹

6. Throughout this Code every definition of an offence, every penal provision and every illustration of every such definition or penal provision, shall be understood subject to the exceptions contained in the Chapter entitled "General Exceptions", though those exceptions are not repeated in such definition, penal provision or illustration.

Definitions in the Code to be understood subject to exceptions.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) The sections in this Code, which contain definitions of offences, do not express that a child under seven years of age cannot commit such offences; but the definitions are to be understood subject to the general exception which provides that nothing shall be an offence which is done by a child under seven years of age.

(b) A, a police-officer, without warrant, apprehends Z who has committed murder. Here A is not guilty of the offence of wrongful confinement; for he was bound by law to apprehend Z, and therefore the case falls within the general exception which provides that "nothing is an offence which is done by a person who is bound by law to do it".

COMMENT.

The proper place for this section would be Chapter IV as it refers to exceptions mentioned in that chapter.

Illustration (a) is based on s. 82, infra, and (b), on s. 76, infra.

7. Every expression which is explained in any part of this Code, is used in every part of this Code in conformity with the explanation.

Sense of expression once explained.

COMMENT.

The maxim inclusio unius est exclusio alterius (the inclusion of one is the exclusion of another) or expressio unius est exclusio alterius (the mention of one is the exclusion of another) is the basis of this section. "To say that it shall have a particular meaning everywhere, is to say that it shall have no other meaning anywhere...if the words taken grammatically have a definite, certain and unequivocal meaning, if they constitute a perfectly complete expression susceptible grammatically of that one unequivocal meaning and of that only, then, however absurd and pernicious the consequences, that meaning is to be followed. If, however, the expression does not include the complete thought of the legislature, or if the words are equally susceptible of several meanings, we are to seek in other parts of the same statute, or in other statutes, certainly in those in pari materia with this, the one of the several possible meanings which ought to be put upon the words.²

It is an ordinary canon of construction that a word which occurs more than once in the same Act must be given the same meaning throughout the Act, unless some definition in the Act or the context shows that the Legislature used the word in different senses.³

Gender.

8. The pronoun "he" and its derivatives are used of any person, whether male or female.

COMMENT.

There is a similar provision in s. 13 of the General Clauses Act⁴ which provides that in all Central Acts and Regulations, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context, words importing the masculine gender shall be taken to include females.

9. Unless the contrary appears¹ from the context, words importing the singular number include the plural number, and words importing the plural number include the singular number.

COMMENT.

The General Clauses Act similarly says that unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context, words in the singular shall include the plural, and vice versa.⁵

1. 'Unless the contrary appears'.—This expression means unless the contrary intention appears.

"Man".

"Woman".

10. The word "man" denotes a male human being of any age: the word "woman" denotes a female human being of any age.¹

COMMENT.

The word 'man', in a scientific treatise on zoology or fossil organic remains, would include men, women, and children, as constituting the highest order of vertebrate animals. It is also used in an abstract and general sense, in philosophical or religious disquisitions. But, in almost every other connection, the word 'man' is used in contradistinction to 'woman'. This restricted sense is its ordinary and popular sense.⁶

Speaking generally, the term 'man' is used in the Code in its generic sense meaning a human being. Thus a girl of six years of age is held to be a woman within the meaning of s. 354 of the Code.⁷

1. 'Of any age'.—These words indicate that a male or female child will come within the word 'man' or 'woman', respectively.

11. The word "person" includes any Company or Association, or body of persons, whether incorporated¹ or not.

"Person".

COMMENT.

The word 'person' includes both a natural person (a human being), whether a man, woman or child and an artificial person (a corporation⁸.) Its definition is not.

exhaustive and must be taken to include artificial or juridical persons as well. An idol is a juridical person capable of owning property and therefore a 'person' as defined in the Code⁹. It is, however, used frequently in the Code in a sense in which it is clear from the context that corporate bodies, etc., are not included.¹⁰

The General Clauses Act¹¹ says that 'person' shall include any company or association or body of individuals, whether incorporated or not. But a limited liability company cannot be committed for trial on an indictment.¹² But persons who abet or aid the company would be liable.¹³

The word 'person' is sufficiently wide to include the Government as representative of the whole community.¹⁴ Thus, possession of wood by a Forest Inspector, a servant of Government, is held to be possession of the Government itself: and a dishonest removal of it, without payment of the necessary fees, from his possession, albeit with his actual consent, constitutes theft if that consent was unauthorized or fraudulent.¹⁵

I. 'Incorporated'.—Incorporation is the formation of a legal body, with the quality of perpetual existence and succession, except as limited by the Royal Charter or Act of Parliament effecting the incorporation.¹⁶

12. The word "public" includes any class of the public or any community.

COMMENT.

This definition is inclusive and does not define the word "public". It only says that class of public or community is included within the term "public". A class or community residing in a particular locality may come within the term "public".¹⁷

In popular parlance the word 'public' means the general body of mankind, or of a nation, State, or community. It is also sometimes used in a more restricted sense of denoting only a particular body or aggregation of people; as, an author's public.¹⁸

13. The word "Queen" denotes the Sovereign for the time being of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

COMMENT.

Section 13A of the General Clauses Act¹⁹ provides that in all Central Acts and Regulations, references to the Sovereign or to the Crown shall, unless a different intention appears, be construed as references to the Sovereign for the time being.

14. The words "servant of the Queen" denote all officers or servants continued, appointed or employed in India by or under the authority of the Government of India Act, 1935, or by or under the authority of any Government¹ in British India or of the Crown Representative.

COMMENT.

The words "servant of the Queen" now include officers or servants continued, appointed or employed by (1) the Government of India, (2) any Government in British India, and (3) the Crown Representative.

1. 'Government'.—See s. 17, infra.

Amendment.—The words "the Government of India Act, 1935...Representative" were substituted for the words "the said Statute 21 & 22 Victoria, Chapter 106, entitled 'an Act for the better government of India', or by or under the authority of the Government of India or any Government" by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937.

In Burma, the word "Burma" was substituted for "India" and for the words "the said Statute...Government" the words "the Government of Burma Act, 1935, or by or under the authority of the Governor of Burma" were substituted by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

15. [Definition of "British India."] Repealed by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937; and the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

16. [Definition of "Government of India."] Repealed by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937; and the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

17. The word "Government" denotes the person or persons authorized by law to administer executive Government in any part of British India.

C O M M E N T .

According to this definition 'Government' means the local Government of a province. A Collector acting in the management of a Khas Mehal, the property of Government, is as much the Government within the meaning of this section as when he is exercising any other of the duties of his official position.²⁰ The General Clauses Act,²¹ however, says that 'Government' or 'the Government' shall include both the Central Government and any Provincial Government.

Act III of 1895 has varied the definition of 'Government' so far as ss. 255 to 263A are concerned. Section 263A defines what 'Government' means in those sections.

Ministers chosen from the elected representatives of the people of the province for the purpose of carrying into effect, if possible, and within prescribed limits, their wishes, and acting as advisers to the Governor, cannot be described as "officers subordinate" to the Governor within the meaning of s. 49 of the Government of India Act, 1935. Although in popular language the Ministers may be referred to as "The Government" they are not "the Government" within the meaning of this section and s. 124A of the Code. The Ministers are, in law, the Governor's advisers.²²

18. [Definition of "Presidency."] Repealed by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937.

19. The word "Judge" denotes not only every person who is officially designated as a Judge, but also every person who is empowered by law to give, in any legal proceeding,¹ civil or criminal, a definitive judgment, or a judgment which, if not appealed who is one of a body of persons, which body of persons is empowered by law to give such a judgment.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A Collector exercising jurisdiction in a suit under Act X of 1859² is a Judge.

(b) A Magistrate exercising jurisdiction in respect of a charge on which he has power to sentence to fine or imprisonment with or without appeal, is a Judge.

(c) A member of a panchayat which has power, under Regulation VII, 1816, of the Madras Code,³ to try and determine suits, is a Judge.

(d) A Magistrate exercising jurisdiction in respect of a charge on which he has power only to commit for trial to another Court, is not a Judge.

COMMENT.

Every person officially designated a Judge is a Judge, e.g. High Court Judge, District Judge, Assistant Judge, and Subordinate Judge.

The illustrations show that a person other than one who is officially designated a Judge and who is empowered to give a definitive judgment, is a Judge only when he is exercising jurisdiction in a suit or in a proceeding. So far as that suit or proceeding—revenue, civil or criminal—is concerned he is a Judge but he is not a Judge when he has not the seisin of the case in which he can give a definitive judgment. This is obvious from the last words of the section under which a body of persons may come under the definition of “Judge” when it is empowered by law to give a judgment, such as arbitrators.²⁴

The definition of “Judge” as given in this section differs from that given in the Civil Procedure Code, s. 2 (8).

1. ‘Legal proceeding.’—This means a proceeding regulated or prescribed by law, in which a judicial decision may or must be given.²⁵ Thus a president of a Union Board is not a Judge because he does not give his judgment in a legal proceeding.¹ A village police patel deciding a case under s. 14 of the Village Police Act (VIII of 1867)² a member of a village Panchayat,³ and the Manager exercising functions under the Chota Nagpur Encumbered Estates Act;⁴ an election officer empowered to remove names from the electoral roll,⁵ come within the term “Judge”.

The expression ‘legal proceeding’ means the same thing as ‘judicial proceedings’, in s. 4(m) of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Magistrate.—A Magistrate is a “judge” within the meaning of this section, read with s. 4(2), Code of Criminal Procedure, only when he is exercising jurisdiction in a suit or in a proceeding. Therefore, an affidavit sworn before a Magistrate cannot be used in the High Court.⁶

Arbitrators.—Arbitrators empowered by law to give a definitive judgment are included in the term ‘Judge’. They can come within the term “judge” only when dealing with a case on reference to their arbitration. It has, however, been held by the Judicial Commissioner’s Court, Peshawar, that an arbitrator is not empowered to give a judgment at all. He makes an award and the Court passes judgment thereon. Hence, an arbitrator is not a Judge within the meaning of this section or s. 21.⁸ This decision is of doubtful authority. The Court passes a decree on the award of an arbitrator which is, therefore, akin to a judgment. It does not pass a judgment on the award.

2. 'Act X of 1859'.—This Act has been repealed in the Chota Nagpur Division of Bengal (except as to the district of Manbhum and the Tributary Mahals) by Ben. Act I of 1879, and in the rest of Bengal (except as to Calcutta, Orissa and the Scheduled Districts) by the Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885). It is now in force in the district of Manbhum, in the Darjeeling District and in part of the Jalpaiguri District in Bengal, and such parts of it as are not inconsistent with the portions of Act VIII of 1885 which have been extended to the Orissa Division are in force in that Division.

'Act X of 1859' has also been repealed in the United Provinces (except as to certain Scheduled Districts) by the United Provinces Rent Act (XVIII of 1873) and Tenancy Act (II of 1901), and in the Central Provinces by the Central Provinces Tenancy Act (IX of 1883), superseded by the Central Provinces Tenancy Act (XI of 1898). In the province of Agra read now "the United Provinces Tenancy Act (II of 1901)" for 'Act X of 1859.'

3. 'Regulation VII, 1816, of the Madras Code'.—This has been repealed by the Madras Civil Courts Act (III of 1873).

20. The words "Court of Justice" denote a Judge who is empowered by law to act judicially alone, or a body of Judges which is empowered by law to act judicially as a body, when such Judge or body of Judges is acting judicially.

ILLUSTRATION.

A panchayat acting under Regulation VII, 1816,¹ of the Madras Code, having power to try and determine suits, is a Court of Justice.

COMMENT.

"Court of Justice" does not mean here the place or building where justice is administered, but the Judge or Judges who conduct judicial proceedings in the due administration of justice. When the Judges are transacting merely administrative business, they are not a Court of Justice.⁹

The term 'Court' is defined in the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, s. 3, but the Bombay High Court has held that that definition is framed only for the purposes of that Act and should not be extended beyond its legitimate scope.¹⁰

1. 'Regulation VII, 1816'.—See Comment on s. 19, supra.

21. The words "public servant" denote a person falling under "Public servant." any of the descriptions hereinafter following, namely :—

First.—Every Covenanted servant of the Queen;

Second.—Every Commissioned Officer in the Military, Naval or Air Forces of the Queen while serving under any Government in British India or the Crown Representative;

Third.—Every Judge;

Fourth.—Every officer of a Court of Justice whose duty it is, as such officer, to investigate or report on any matter of law or fact, or to make, authenticate, or keep any document, or to take charge or dispose of any property, or to execute any judicial process, or to administer any oath, or to interpret, or to preserve order in the Court; and every person specially authorized by a Court of Justice to perform any of such duties;

Fifth.—Every juryman, assessor, or member of a panchayat assisting a Court of Justice or public servant;

¹⁰ Tulja, (1887) 12 Bom. 36. See Venkatachala Pillai, (1887) 10 Mad. 154.

Sixth.—Every arbitrator or other person to whom any cause or matter has been referred for decision or report by any Court of Justice, or by any other competent public authority ;

Seventh.—Every person who holds any office by virtue of which he is empowered to place or keep any person in confinement ;

Eighth.—Every officer of the Crown whose duty it is, as such officer, to prevent offences, to give information of offences, to bring offenders to justice, or to protect the public health, safety or convenience ;

Ninth.—Every officer whose duty, it is, as such officer, to take, receive, keep or expend any property on behalf of the Crown, or to make any survey, assessment or contract on behalf of the Crown, or to execute any revenue-process, or to investigate, or to report, on any matter affecting the pecuniary interests of the Crown, or to make, authenticate or keep any document relating to the pecuniary interests of the Crown, or to prevent the infraction of any law for the protection of the pecuniary interests of the Crown, and every officer in the service or pay of the Crown or remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty ;

Tenth.—Every officer whose duty it is, as such officer, to take, receive, keep or expend any property, to make any survey or assessment or to levy any rate or tax for any secular common purpose of any village, town or district, or to make, authenticate or keep any document for the ascertaining of the rights of the people of any village, town or district.

ILLUSTRATION.

A Municipal Commissioner is a public servant.

Eleventh.—Every person who holds any office in virtue of which he is empowered to prepare, publish, maintain or revise an electoral roll or to conduct an election or part of an election.

Explanation 1.—Persons falling under any of the above descriptions are public servants, whether appointed by the Government or not.

Explanation 2.—Wherever the words “public servant” occur, they shall be understood of every person who is in actual possession of the situation of a public servant, whatever legal defect there may be in his right to hold that situation.

Explanation 3.[†]—The word “election” denotes an election for the purpose of selecting members of any legislative, municipal or other public authority, of whatever character, the method of selection to which is by, or under, any law prescribed as by election.

COMMENT.

A line is drawn between the great mass of the community and certain classes of persons in the service and pay of Government, or exercising various public functions, who are here included in the words “public servant.” Those offences which

[†] In Burma, the following Explanation is substituted by Burma Act XVII of 1939.—

Explanation 3.—The word “election” means the selection, by any method which is by law are common between public servants and other members of the community are left to the general provisions of the Code. But there are several offences which can only be committed by public servants: and on the other hand public servants in the discharge of their duties have many privileges peculiar to themselves.¹¹ Public servants are dealt with more strictly than other persons for offences committed by them as they enjoy various privileges and possess power and authority. The offences peculiar to them are classed separately in Chapter IX.

The word 'servant' shall be deemed to signify any person duly appointed and invested with authority to administer any part of the executive power of the Crown, or to execute any other public duty imposed by law, whether it be judicial, ministerial, or mixed. This section does not define what a "public servant" means but enumerates the various functionaries who will be designated as public servants. A public servant is one who has to discharge some public duty. All Government servants are not public servants.

Clause 1.—'Covenanted servant'.—The members of the Indian Civil Service were known as covenanted servants as they had to sign a covenant by which they bound themselves to contribute for their pension and not to trade or to receive presents. This covenant was entered into after they were selected by the Board of Directors of the East India Company. Such a covenant is still, as a matter of form, signed by those who are successful in the Civil Service competitive examination.

Clause 2.—Statute 25 & 26 Vic., c. 4, enables His Majesty the King to issue Commissions to officers of the regular Army and Navy. Every officer holding a Commission in the Military, Naval or Air Forces of the King—Regular, Auxiliary or Volunteer—will be deemed to be a public servant, while serving under the Government of India or any Government. The words "or Air" were inserted by Act X of 1927. The words "in British India or the Crown Representative" were substituted for the words "of India or any Government" by Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. In Burma, the words "of India or any Government" were omitted by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

Clause 3.—The word "Judge" is defined in s. 19, A member of a Village Panchayat Court is a Judge.¹²

Clause 4.—A peon¹³ or a person¹⁴ executing a judicial process or a warrant of arrest¹⁵ or attachment¹⁶ or an officer whose duty it is to take property¹⁷ or a mukaddam—gumashta whose duty it is to report certain offences under the Penal Code.^{17a} comes under this Clause.

Clause 5.—In Burma, for the word "panchayat", the words "Village Committee" were substituted by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

Clause 6.—'Referred for decision or report'—To bring a case within this clause, there must be some cause or matter existing in dispute or controversy, in regard to which a competent public authority is desirous of a report to enable it to deal with the matter in dispute between the parties.¹⁸

Clause 7.—Convict-warders¹⁹ come under this clause.

Clause 8.—Persons appointed by a Government Solicitor to conduct prosecutions;²⁰ revenue and police Patels;²¹ the gorait of a village;²² officers of the Society for Clause 9.—Throughout this clause the words "the Crown" were substituted for the word "Government" by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937.

'Officer'.—This word means a person employed to exercise to some extent a delegated function of Government; he must be either himself armed with some authority or representative character, or his duties must be immediately auxiliary to those of some one who is so armed.²⁵ It means a functionary or holder of some officium or office however humble, to whom in some degree are delegated certain functions of Government.¹

'Officer in the service or pay of'.—This expression means one who is appointed to some office for the performance of some public duty.²

Cases.—A surveyor employed by the Collector in the Khas Mehal department;³ a clerk in a Government Collectorate;⁴ a peon in the service and pay of Government and attached to the office of a Superintendent of the Salt Department;⁵ a put-waree;⁶ a supernumerary peon of the Collector's Court, who receives no fixed pay, but is remunerated by fees;⁷ a lascar in the service of the Public Works Department distributing water from public irrigation channels;⁸ a candidate or apprentice peon who serves process without remuneration;⁹ and a talayaree who assists the village office in collecting revenue,¹⁰ are public servants. The manager of an estate employed under the Court of Wards is a public servant according to the Allahabad High Court,¹¹ but not according to the Calcutta High Court.¹² A peon employed by such a manager is not a public servant.¹³

Clause 10.—The words "for any secular common purpose of any village, town or district" govern the whole clause. If any money is received or expended, it must be for a public purpose within the meaning of the section.¹⁴

Municipal engineers;¹⁵ municipal servants under the City of Bombay Municipal Act, III of 1888;¹⁶ a clerk in the Cess-collection Department of a Municipality constituted under the Bombay District Municipal Act;¹⁷ a municipal tax collector;¹⁸ a conservancy officer of the Corporation of Calcutta;¹⁹ a Local Board Sircar;²⁰ a Union Karnam;²¹ a chairman of a Union Panchayat;²² a toll contractor as well as his servant;²³ a bill collector of a Union Board;²⁴ the Vice-Chairman under the C. The Sanitary Inspector of a Panchayat Board is not a public servant as he has not to perform any of the duties specified in this clause.²

Clause 11.—This clause was added by the Indian Elections Offences and Inquiries Act (XXXIX of 1920).

Explanation 1.—This Explanation shows that persons who hold offices under local laws, if their duties fall within any of the descriptions here given, are public servants. The absence of a formal appointment is immaterial where a person is in actual possession of a situation as a public servant.³

Explanation 2.—Public servant pro confesso.—Any person, whether receiving pay or not, who chooses to take upon himself duties and responsibilities belonging to the position of a public servant, and performs those duties, and accepts those responsibilities and is recognized as filling the position of a public servant, must be regarded as one, and it does not lie in his mouth to say subsequently that, notwithstanding his performance of public duties and the recognition by others of such performance, he is not a “public servant”. “If such a contention were allowed, and the question whether a man was a public servant were to depend wholly upon the test of his receiving or not receiving a salary, very great mischief and difficulty might arise in a country like this, where numerous persons are engaged in the performance of public duties without pay”.⁴

According to this Explanation the person who in fact discharges the duties of the office which bring him under some one of the descriptions of public servant, is for all the purposes of the Code rightfully a public servant, whatever legal defect there may be in his right to hold the office.⁵

A person serving as a volunteer in a Tahsildar's office,⁶ a Zamindari karnam,⁷ and a sanitary inspector under the Food Adulteration Act (Beng. Act VI of 1919),⁸ are public servants.

Explanation 3.—This explanation was added by the Indian Elections Offences and Inquiries Act (XXXIX of 1920).

Statutory public servants.—Various functionaries have been, by several local and special Acts, declared to be ‘public servants’ for the purpose of the Indian Penal Code.

For example a municipal inspector within the meaning of the Madras District Municipal Act (s. 41);⁹ a karkun employed by a manager appointed under Act XV of 1871 to execute revenue processes and receive rent;¹⁰ the Chairman of a District School Board constituted under the Bombay Primary Education Act, 1923.¹¹

Not statutory public servants.—A police-officer under suspension within the meaning of s. 8 of Act V of 1861;¹² a municipal corporation within the meaning of s. 39 of Beng. Act IV of 1877;¹³ a person nominated by a Collector under s. 69 of the Bengal Tenancy Act;¹⁴ a goods clerk of a railway company for the purpose of Chapter IX of the Penal Code;¹⁵ a person assisting, in virtue of s. 11 of the Burma Village Act, the headman of a village in arresting a person;¹⁶ and a Civic Guard unless the order calling him out is published in the Calcutta Police Gazette.¹⁷

Not public servants.—A lessee of a village who has undertaken to keep an account of its forest revenues and pay a certain proportion to the Government, keeping the remainder for himself;¹⁸ a Poddar of the Bank of Bengal;¹⁹ a Mysore policeman;²⁰ a peon employed by the manager of an estate under the charge of the Court of Wards;²¹ a carter employed by Government;²² an arbitrator appointed by the parties to a proceeding under s. 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code;²³ a clerk appointed by a Sub-Registrar and paid out of an allowance given to the latter;²⁴ a Municipal Water-Tax Collector;²⁵ an unpaid apprentice of Government;¹ a villager required to bring an accused person to a police-station in arrest under s. 11 of the Burma Village Act;² a village chowkidar;³ a municipal committee (though the members forming the municipal corporation are public servants);⁴ and the president of a Co-operative Society.⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Where the offence concerns any ‘public servant’ it is sufficient to show “actual possession of the situation”, and this is sufficiently shown by the proof that the duties or functions are actually discharged by the person alleged to be such servant.

22. The words “moveable property” are intended to include corporeal property of every description, except land and things attached to the earth or permanently fastened to anything which is attached to the earth.

COMMENT.

The term ‘property’ conveys a compound idea composed of that which is its subject, and of the right to be exercised over it. It is everywhere used in this Code so as to be applicable exclusively to “that which is its subject”.⁶

The General Clauses Act of 1897 says that “moveable property” shall mean property of every description, except “immoveable property”.⁷ The Indian Registration Act says that “moveable property” includes standing timber, growing crops and grass, fruit upon and juice in trees, and property of every other description, except “immoveable property”.⁸ The Indian Companies Act (VII of 1913), s. 28, provides that “the shares or other interest of any member in a company shall be moveable property, transferable in manner provided by the articles of the company”.

The definition in the Penal Code is restricted to corporeal property; it excludes all choses in action. It differs from the definitions given in the two above Acts, as it excludes incorporeal rights.

1. ‘Corporeal property’ is property which may be perceived by the senses, in contradistinction to incorporeal rights, which are not so perceivable, as obligations of all kinds. Thus, salt produced on a swamp,⁹ papers forming part of the record of case,¹⁰ and a cheque,¹¹ are moveable property within the meaning of this section.

In an Allahabad case the question arose, but was not decided, whether a letter received by post could be considered “moveable property” of the receiver. A letter addressed to W was handed by a postman to W, who was at the time in a room in the occupation of H. W read the letter, and put it on a table in the room and left it there. H took the letter, and subsequently attempted to file it as an exhibit attached to an affidavit made by him in a suit for judicial separation between W and his wife, for the purpose, as he afterwards stated, "of strengthening Mrs. W's case and of improving his own position. The Court, however, refused to receive the letter. It was held that in the circumstances H could not be convicted of dishonest misappropriation of property with respect to his retention of the letter.¹²

2. 'Land and things attached to the earth'.—This section does not exempt "earth and things attached to the earth", but "land and things attached to the earth"; "land" and "earth" are not synonymous terms, and there is a great distinction between "the earth" and "earth". By severance things that are immoveable become movable, and it is perfectly correct to call those things attached which can be severed; and undoubtedly it is possible to sever earth from the earth, and attach it again thereto. Earth, that is soil and all the component parts of the soil, inclusive of stones and minerals, when severed from the earth or land to which it was attached, is moveable property capable of being the subject of theft.¹³ Any part of "the earth", whether it be stones or sand or clay or any other component, when severed from "the earth" is moveable property.¹⁴ But growing crops¹⁵ or standing teak trees¹⁶ are not moveable property.

'Attached to the earth'.—The Transfer of Property Act defines this expression. According to s. 3 of that Act "attached to the earth" means

- (a) rooted in the earth, as in the case of trees and shrubs;
- (b) imbedded in the earth, as in the case of walls of buildings; or
- (c) attached to what is so imbedded for the permanent beneficial enjoyment of that to which it is attached.

23. "Wrongful gain" is gain by unlawful means of property
 "Wrongful gain". to which the person gaining is not legally entitled.

"Wrongful loss" is the loss by unlawful means
 "Wrongful loss". of property to which the person losing it is legally entitled.

A person is said to gain wrongfully when such person retains wrongfully, as well as when such person acquires wrongfully. A person is said to lose wrongfully when such person is wrongfully kept out of any property,¹ as well as when such person is wrongfully deprived of property.

COMMENT.

The word 'wrongful' means prejudicially affecting a party in some legal right. This word is not defined anywhere in the Code though the word "illegal" is defined in s. 43. The words 'by unlawful means' are intended to refer to an act which would render the doer liable to an action or prosecution.¹⁷

For either wrongful loss or gain, the property must be lost to the owner or the owner must be wrongfully kept out of it. Thus, where a pledgee used a turban that was pledged, it was held that the deterioration of the turban by use was not 'wrongful loss' of property to the owner, and the wrongful beneficial use of it by the pledgee was not a 'wrongful gain' to him.¹⁸

1. 'Wrongfully kept out of any property'—When the owner is kept out of possession of his property with the object of depriving him of the benefit arising from the possession, even temporarily, the case will come within the definition.¹⁹ But where the owner is kept out of possession temporarily not with any such intention, but only with the object of causing him trouble in the sense of mere mental anxiety, and with the ultimate intention of restoring the thing to him without exacting or expecting any recompense, it is difficult to say that the detention amounts to causing wrongful loss in any sense. Thus, where the accused, who was charged by his master with having committed theft of a box, stated that he had removed the box and left it concealed in the cow-shed to give a lesson to his master, it was held that no theft was committed as there was no wrongful loss.²⁰

Fees payable to a college for attending lectures are 'property' within the meaning of this section.²¹

CASES.

Wrongful loss.—Cattle.—Forcible and illegal seizure of bullocks of a widow in satisfaction of a debt due to the accused by her deceased husband was held to be a 'wrongful loss',²² but not illegal seizure and sending to a pond of cattle, even though this was done with the malicious intent of subjecting the owners to additional expense, inconvenience, and annoyance.²³ Merely permitting cattle to stray was held not to establish any intention of causing 'wrongful loss' to the public or any person.²⁴

Secreting document.—Where the plaintiff, in a suit referred to arbitration, with a view to prevent a witness from referring to an endorsement on a bond, snatched up the bond which was lying beside the arbitrator, ran away, and refused to produce it, it was held that it could hardly be inferred from those circumstances that the act of the accused was prompted by any desire to cause 'wrongful loss' or 'wrongful gain'.²⁵

Breach of condition not 'wrongful loss'.—Where a person who purchased rice from a famine relief officer at a certain rate, on condition that he should sell it at a pound the rupee less did not sell it at the rate agreed upon, but at four pounds the rupee less, it was held that no wrongful gain or wrongful loss had been caused to anyone within the meaning of this section. The rice having been sold to the accused, and he having paid for it, it was not unlawful for him to sell it again at such prices as he thought fit.¹

Abatement of nuisance by unlawful means.—Where the accused demolished a structure because it was an encroachment on a public street, it was held that as the accused had no justification in law to demolish it the acts done by them were not lawful and they were guilty of mischief.²

24. Whoever does anything with the intention of causing wrongful gain to one person or wrongful loss to another person, is said to do that thing "dishonestly".

COMMENT.

From this definition it will appear that the term 'dishonestly' is not used in the Code in its popular significance as implying deviation from probity. Dishonesty in law is at times different from the dishonesty of the market place. Unless there is wrongful gain to one person, or wrongful loss to another, an act would not be 'dishonest'. It is not necessary for a thing to be done 'dishonestly' that there should be an intention to cause both wrongful gain and wrongful loss. Except so far as loss or detriment is almost necessarily involved when an advantage is obtained, any intention of causing loss is a matter of inference.

The word 'dishonestly' is used as bearing relation to property. The 'intention' under the section must be to cause wrongful gain or wrongful loss to a person. "The word 'intent,' by its etymology, seems to have metaphorical allusion to archery, and implies 'aim' and thus connotes not a casual or merely possible result—foreseen perhaps as a not improbable incident, but not desired—but rather connotes the one object for which the effort is made—and thus has reference to what has been called the dominant motive, without which the action would not have been taken.”³ A dishonest intention may be presumed only if an unlawful act is done or if a lawful act is done by unlawful means.⁴ An actual intention to convert an illegal or doubtful claim into an apparently legal one makes an action dishonest.⁵

The definition of the word ‘dishonestly’ is not exhaustive.⁶

The word ‘dishonestly’ occurs alone in the definition of theft (s. 378), extortion (s. 383), robbery (s. 390), criminal misappropriation (s. 403), criminal breach of trust (s. 405), and receiving stolen property (s. 411). It occurs with the word ‘fraudulently’, defined in the next section, in several offences such as cheating (s. 415) forgery (s. 463), and counterfeit coins (ss. 246, 247).

The law takes into account the primary or immediate intention and not the secondary or remote. Thus, if A takes an article belonging to Z out of Z’s possession, without Z’s consent, with the intention of keeping it until he obtains money from Z as a reward for its restoration, he takes it dishonestly and commits theft.⁷ As every man is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his act, it is from the consequences that the Court has often to presume the intention of the accused in doing a particular act. The law does not look to the motive: it looks only to the intention. Motive and intention are two different things. Motive is directed to the ultimate end, good or bad, which a person hopes to secure; his intention is concerned with the immediate effects of his acts. End cannot justify the means, in other language, the motive does not justify the intention. Take the case of a scoundrel or a man of bad character, whom it might be desirable to destroy on the spot, but if a person takes the law into his own hands and kills him, none the less he is guilty of murder.

25. A person is said to do a thing fraudulently if he does that “Fraudulently”. thing with intent to defraud¹ but not otherwise.

COMMENT.

“As a definition this provision is obviously imperfect, and perhaps introduces an element of doubt, which did not previously exist; for it leaves it to be determined, . . . whether the word ‘defraud’...implies the deprivation or intended deprivation of property as a part or result of the fraud.”⁸

The word ‘fraudulently’ is equivalent to ‘intent to defraud.’ It should not be confined to transactions of which deprivation of property forms a part.⁹

The word ‘fraudulently’ occurs alone in the definition of many offences, chief of which are offences against public justice (ss. 206-208, 210), weights and measures (ss. 264-266), and counterfeit coins and stamps (ss. 242, 243, 252, 253, 261-263).

1. ‘Intent to defraud.’—“The word ‘intent’, by its etymology, seems to have metaphorical allusion to archery, and implies ‘aim’ and thus connotes not a casual or merely possible result—foreseen perhaps as a not improbable incident, but not desired—but rather connotes the one object for which the effort is made—and thus has reference to what has been called the dominant motive, without which the action would not have been taken.”¹⁰ The terms ‘fraud’ and ‘defraud’ are not defined in the Penal Code. The word ‘defraud’ is of double meaning in the sense that it either may or may not imply deprivation, and, as it is not defined, its meaning must not be sought by a consideration of the context in which the word ‘fraudulently’ is found.¹¹ Sir James Stephen, in his History of the Criminal Law of England,¹² observes: “There has always been a great reluctance amongst lawyers to attempt to define fraud, and this is not unnatural when we consider the number of different kinds of conduct to which the word is applied in connection with different branches of law, and especially in connection with the equitable branch of it. I shall not attempt to construct a definition which will meet every case which might be suggested, but there is little danger in saying that whenever the words 'fraud' or 'intent to defraud' or 'fraudulently' occur in the definition of a crime two elements at least are essential to the commission of the crime: namely, first, deceit or an intention to deceive or in some cases mere secrecy; and, secondly, either actual injury or possible injury or an intent to expose some person either to actual injury or to a risk of possible injury by means of that deceit or secrecy. This intent, I may add, is very seldom the only or the principal intention entertained by the fraudulent person, whose principal object in nearly every case is his own advantage. The injurious deception is usually intended only as a means to an end, though this, as I have already explained, does not prevent it from being intentional. A practically conclusive test as to the fraudulent character of a deception for criminal purposes is this: Did the author of the deceit derive any advantage from it which he could not have had if the truth had been known? If so, it is hardly possible that that advantage should not have had an equivalent in loss, or risk of loss, to some one else; and if so, there was fraud. In practice people hardly ever intentionally deceive each other in matters of business for a purpose which is not fraudulent."

Approving these observations, the Allahabad High Court has laid down that where there is an intention to deceive and by means of the deceit to obtain an advantage there is fraud.¹³ A somewhat wider interpretation has been placed on the word 'fraud' in Haycraft v. Creasy,¹⁴ which is expressly followed by the Bombay High Court.¹⁵ Le Blanc, J., in the judgment, says: "By fraud, I understand an intention to deceive; whether it be from any expectation of advantage to the party himself, or from ill-will towards the other is immaterial."

The expression 'intent to defraud' implies conduct coupled with an intention to deceive and thereby to injure; in other words, 'defraud' involves two conceptions, namely, deceit and injury to the person deceived, that is an infringement of some legal right possessed by him, but not necessarily deprivation of property.¹⁶ The term 'defraud' denotes some form of dishonesty. An 'intention to defraud' has to be inferred from the conduct of the accused, and must necessarily involve something in the nature of cheating.¹⁷ The issuing of a false statutory report of a company calculated to deceive the public and intended to induce them to invest their money in the company which they would not otherwise have invested is an act done 'with intent to defraud' within the meaning of this section.¹⁸ Where the accused, after the execution and registration of a document which was not required by law to be attested, added his name to the document as an attesting witness, but without putting a date or alleging actual presence at the time of its execution, it was held that this act was neither fraudulent nor dishonest and that the accused was therefore not guilty of forgery.¹⁹ Similarly, where the accused attested a document, without the authority of the executant, after its execution, to prevent other people from setting up a claim to the property in the possession of the accused under the document, it was held that he was not guilty of forgery for there was no intention to defraud where no wrongful result was intended or could have arisen from the act of the accused.²⁰ The accused, in order to obtain recognition from a Settlement Officer that they were entitled to the title of "Loksar," filed a sannad before that officer purporting to grant that title. This document was found not to be genuine and they were convicted under ss. 471 and 464 by the Sessions Judge. It was held that they could not be found guilty as their intention was not to cause wrongful gain or wrongful loss to anyone, but to produce a false belief in the mind of the Settlement Officer that they were entitled to the dignity of "Loskur" and that this could not be said to constitute an intention to 'defraud'.²¹ This case cannot be reconciled with the full bench decision of the Madras High Court in Kotam-raj's case.²²

A general intention to defraud, without the intention of causing wrongful gain to one person or wrongful loss to another, would be sufficient to support a conviction.²³ In order to prove an intent to defraud it is not at all necessary that there should have been some person defrauded, or who might possibly have been defrauded. "A man may have an intent to defraud, and yet there may not be any person who could be defrauded by his act. Suppose a person with a good account at his bankers, and a friend, with his knowledge, forges his name to a cheque either to try his credit, or to imitate his handwriting, there would be no intent to defraud, though there would be parties who might be defrauded; but where another person has no account at his bankers, but a man supposes that he has, and on that supposition forges his name, there would be an intent to defraud in that case, although no person could be defrauded."²⁴ When it is material to prove an intent to defraud, evidence may be given of similar offences by the defendant.²⁵

Where property was removed openly in the light of day and there was no question of concealment, secrecy, clandestine action, deception or of anything else which the word "fraud" suggests, the act could not be said to be made or done fraudulently.¹

'Fraudulently': 'Dishonestly.'—There is a real distinction between the meaning of the terms 'fraudulently' and 'dishonestly'; the former denotes an intention to deceive. The difference between an act done dishonestly and an act done fraudulently is that if there is the intention by the deceit practised to cause wrongful loss that is dishonesty, but even in the absence of such an intention, if the deceitful act wilfully exposes anyone to risk of loss, there is fraud.² The production of a forged bond by a person in a suit with the intent to make the Court believe that he was entitled to recover money upon the basis of the particular document produced, though it may not be dishonest within the meaning of s. 24, may yet be fraudulent within the meaning of s. 471.³

26. A person is said to have "reason to believe" a thing if he
 "Reason to believe." has sufficient cause to believe that thing but not otherwise.

COMMENT.

A person can be supposed to 'know' where there is a direct appeal to his senses. A person "has reason to believe" under this section if he has sufficient cause to believe the thing but not otherwise.⁴

The expression "reason to believe" occurs in ss. 411 to 414.

See Comment on s. 414 where the word 'believe' is distinguished from 'suspect'.

27. When property is in the possession of a person's wife,¹ clerk or servant,² on account of that person, it is in that person's possession within the meaning of this Code.

Explanation.—A person employed temporarily or on a particular occasion in the capacity of a clerk, or servant, is a clerk or servant within the meaning of this section.

COMMENT.

Under this section property in the possession of a person's wife, clerk or servant, on account of that person, is deemed to be in that person's possession.

Object.—The object of the framers of the Code in the Explanation is to lay down a few rules, in accordance with the general sense of mankind, for the purpose of preventing any difference of opinion arising in cases likely to occur very often.

Principle.—This section abrogates the distinction made by the English law between 'possession' and 'custody.' But it does not express the complete thought of the Legislature on the question of possession.⁵ 'Possession' involves the idea of proprietorship, the right to exercise power or control over the thing possessed.

According to English law 'possession' is used as regards the owner, whereas 'custody' is used to mean 'such a relation towards the thing as would constitute possession if the person having custody had it on his own account.'⁶ What would be a mere 'custody' under English law would be 'possession' under the Code.

Corporeal property is in a person's possession when he has such power over it that he can exclude others from it, and intends to exercise, if necessary, that power on behalf of himself or of some person for whom he is a trustee. But a wife, a clerk, or a servant, has not this power of intention to deal with things in their charge as owners. They are, therefore, said to have custody merely according to English law.

A man's goods are in his possession, not only while they are in his house or on his premises, but also when they are in a place where he may usually send them (as when horses and cattle feed on common land), or in a place where they may be lawfully deposited by him, as if he buries money or ornaments in his own land, or puts them in any other secret place of deposit.

1. 'Wife'.—A permanent mistress may be regarded as a 'wife'. When a man furnishes a house for his mistress' occupation, he may reasonably be presumed to be in possession of all articles therein which can reasonably be inferred to belong to him or to be in the possession of his mistress on his behalf. But the inference must be inapplicable to articles of which the mistress is in possession illegally or contrary to the provisions of law, especially when the article in question is such that he might well remain in ignorance that it was in his mistress' possession.⁷

2. 'Clerk or servant'.—The possession by a clerk or servant of that which belongs to the master, or of that which, whether it belongs absolutely to his master, or to another person, the clerk or servant holds for his master and on his account, is the master's possession. The possession of the servant must be on account of his master to make the master liable. A pistol was discovered lying on the floor of a shop which could not reasonably be expected to be dealing in such articles. At the time of the discovery the shop was in charge of a servant and there was no proof that he was holding the pistol for his master. It was held that the master was not liable.⁸

28. A person is said to "counterfeit" who causes one thing¹ to resemble another thing, intending by means of that resemblance to practise deception, or knowing it to be likely that deception will thereby be practised.

Explanation 1.—It is not essential to counterfeiting that the imitation should be exact.

Explanation 2.—When a person causes one thing to resemble another thing, and the resemblance is such that a person might be deceived thereby, it shall be presumed until the contrary is proved, that the person so causing the one thing to resemble the other thing intended by means of that resemblance to practise deception or knew it to be likely that deception would thereby be practised.

COMMENT.

The word 'counterfeit' occurs in offences relating to coins provided in Chapter XII, and offences relating to trade and property marks in Chapter XVIII. The word 'counterfeit' does not connote an exact reproduction of the original counterfeited. The difference between the counterfeit and the original is not therefore limited to a difference existing only by reason of faulty reproduction.⁹

Under this section it is not necessary to show that deception actually took place. Intention to practise deception by causing one thing to resemble another is quite sufficient.

1. 'Thing.'—The thing may be a coin or a piece of metal. Its value is immaterial. The counterfeit coin may be more valuable so far as money value is considered than the coin for which it is intended to pass.

When the coins counterfeited are such imitations of the genuine coin as might deceive people on account of the resemblance, the presumption referred to in explanation 2 arises.¹⁰ Altering used stamps so as to resemble genuine unused stamps amounts to counterfeiting.¹¹ If coins are made to resemble genuine coins and the intention of the makers is merely to use them in order to foist a false case upon their enemies, those coins do not come within the definition of counterfeit coins.¹²

Amendment.—Explanations 1 and 2 have been substituted for the original Explanation by Act 1 of 1889, s. 9.

29. The word "document" denotes any matter expressed or described upon any substance by means of letters, figures or marks, or by more than one of those means, intended to be used,¹ or which may be used, as evidence of that matter.

Explanation 1.—It is immaterial by what means or upon what substance the letters, figures or marks are formed, or whether the evidence is intended for, or may be used in, a Court of Justice, or not.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

A writing expressing the terms of a contract, which may be used as evidence of the contract, is a document.

A cheque upon a banker is a document.

A power-of-attorney is a document.

A map or plan which is intended to be used or which may be used as evidence, is a document.

A writing containing directions or instructions is a document.

Explanation 2.—Whatever is expressed by means of letters, figures or marks as explained by mercantile or other usage, shall be deemed to be expressed by such letters, figures or marks within the meaning of this section, although the same may not be actually expressed.

ILLUSTRATION.

A writes his name on the back of a bill of exchange payable to his order. The meaning of the endorsement, as explained by mercantile usage, is that the bill is to be paid to the holder. The endorsement is a document, and must be construed in the same manner as if the words "pay to the holder" or words to that effect had been written over the signature.

COMMENT.

The term 'document' seems to include everything done by the pen, by engraving, by printing, or otherwise, whereby is made on paper, parchment, wood, or other substance a representation of words or other equivalents addressed to the eye. This word occurs in ss. 167, 175, 192, 204, 464, and 479.

The definition here given seems to be faulty; because the "matter described" is manifestly not the "document". According to English law the material on which words are written is said to be a 'document.' Under the Code it is the matter written and not the material that is called a 'document.' But the matter should be intended to be used as evidence of that matter. A writing is a document. Words printed, lithographed, or photographed are documents. A map or plan is a document. An inscription on a metal plate or stone is a document. A caricature is a document. Letters or marks imprinted on trees and intended to be used as evidence that the trees were passed for removal by a Ranger of a forest, are a document.¹³ A hammer for marking sleepers is a document.¹⁴

An avouchment, whether written or printed, of the character or quality of a chattel, is not a document which, if false, would be forgery, e.g., the false signature of an artist's name to a picture,¹⁵ or enclosing spurious goods in a wrapper imitating a trade-mark.¹⁶ But an instrument, though not signed by all parties thereto, fulfils the requirements of the definition of "document".¹⁷

Section 3 of the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872) says that 'document' means any matter expressed or described upon any substance by means of letters, figures or marks, or by more than one of those means intended to be used, or which may be used for the purpose of recording that matter.

Section 3 (16) of the General Clauses Act says that 'document' shall include any matter written, expressed or described upon any substance by means of letters figures or marks, or by more than one of those means which is intended to be used, or which may be used, for the purpose of recording that matter.

1. 'Intended to be used.'—A writing which is not legal evidence of the matter expressed may yet be a document, if the parties framing it believed it to be, and intended it to be, evidence of such matter.¹⁸

Amendment.—The present Explanations were substituted by Act I of 1889, s. 9.

30. The words "valuable security" denote a document which is, or purports to be,¹ a document whereby any legal right is created, extended, transferred, restricted, extinguished or released, or whereby any person acknowledges that he lies under legal liability, or has not a certain legal right.

"Valuable security".

ILLUSTRATION.

A writes his name on the back of a bill of exchange. As the effect of this endorsement is to transfer the right to the bill to any person who may become the lawful holder of it, the endorsement is a "valuable security."

COMMENT.

The words "valuable security" denote a particular class of documents, viz., such documents as create or extinguish legal rights. This expression occurs in ss. 329-331, 347, 348, 420, 467, and 477.

1. 'Which is, or purports to be.'—The use of the words "which is, or purports to be" indicates that a document, which, upon certain evidence being given, may be held to be invalid, but on the face of it creates, or purports to create, a right in immoveable property, although a decree could not be passed upon the document, is contemplated within the purview of that section. Had it not been so, any forged document, if the forgery was admitted, or any document which was not executed or stamped according to law and on which no decree could be passed by a civil Court, could not be called a valuable security.¹⁹

Unstamped document.—The fact that a document has not been stamped, or not properly stamped, and is not, therefore, receivable in evidence, does not prevent its being a valuable security.²⁰ This is so because such document “purports to be” a valuable security. A document whereby a person acknowledges himself to be under a legal liability is a valuable security.²¹

Unregistered document.—An unregistered document though it may not be a valuable security until the registration is completed still “purports” to be a valuable security.²²

Copy.—The term “valuable security” applies to the original document, and not to a copy.

Cancelled instrument.—A cancelled instrument is not a valuable security, “for an instrument available, for the purpose for which it was made is clearly what the clause intended; a cancelled instrument therefore, though by the cancelling of it a legal right may be ‘extinguished’, inasmuch as the instrument upon which such right depended is thereby voided, does not fall within its scope.”²³

Valuable securities.—A settlement of accounts in writing, though not signed by any person, and containing no promise to pay;²⁴ a kabulayat;²⁵ a deed of divorce;¹ a hundi;² a title page in an account book containing the names of partners and the amount of the capital contributed by each and signed by them;³ a counterfoil of a paying-in slip purporting to be an acknowledgment of receipt of a sum of money by a bank;⁴ an original transit pass without which no forest produce could be removed, under a Forest Regulation;⁵ a promissory note executed by a minor through force;⁶ and blank pieces of paper on which thumb-impressions are put by a person through fear of injury,⁷ are valuable securities.

A signature purporting to be that of B was forged on each of two printed forms, one intended to be used as a promissory note and the other as a receipt. The blank spaces left for entering particulars of the amount, the name of the person in whose favour the document was executed, the date and place of execution and the rate of interest were not filled in; a one-anna stamp was affixed on the top of each paper, but the stamp was neither signed across nor cancelled in any way. It was held that the documents, as they stood, were valuable securities.⁸ A document, though not signed by all the parties thereto, is a valuable security if it imposes an obligation on the actual executants and an option on the others and there is no condition precedent to be found in the document that the document is to be inoperative against the executants until all the parties executed it.⁹ Where, with a view to arriving at a compromise, the appellant executed a patta purporting to create a legal right in the other party in the land in dispute, and although the land comprised in the said patta belonged to a family of six it was signed by the appellant and the respondent only as representing the family, it was held that the document came within the definition of valuable security.¹⁰

Not valuable securities.—The copy of a lease;¹¹ a sanad purporting to confer a personal title;¹² a postal receipt for an insured parcel;¹³ a copy of a decree passed by a Court;¹⁴ an administrative order passed by the Superintendent of Court of

31. The words "a will" denote any testamentary document.

COMMENT.

A "will" is a disposition or declaration by which the person making it provides for the distribution or administration of property after his death. It does not take effect until the testator's death, and is always revocable by him.

The Indian Succession Act¹⁷ defines 'will' as "the legal declaration of the intention of the testator with respect to his property which he desires to be carried into effect after his death." The General Clauses Act¹⁸ says that 'will' "shall include a codicil and every writing making a voluntary posthumous disposition of property". This term occurs in ss. 467 and 477 of the Code.

32. In every part of this Code, except where a contrary intention appears from the context, words which refer to acts¹ done extend also to illegal² omissions.³

COMMENT.

This section simply says that acts include illegal omissions.

1. 'Acts'.—An 'act' generally means something voluntarily done by a person. 'Act' is a determination of the will, producing an effect in the sensible world. This word includes writing and speaking, or, in short, any external manifestation. In the Code the term 'act' is not confined to its ordinary meaning of positive conduct of doing something but includes also illegal omissions.

2. 'Illegal'.—See post, s. 43.

3. 'Omissions'.—This word is used in the sense of intentional non-doing. Thus, according to this section, 'act' includes intentional doing as well as intentional non-doing. The omission or neglect must no doubt be such as to have an active effect conducing to the result, as a link in the chain of facts from which an intention to bring about the result may be inferred.¹⁹ The Code makes punishable omissions which have caused, which have been intended to cause, or which have been known to be likely to cause, a certain evil effect in the same manner as it punishes acts, provided they were illegal. And when the law imposes on a person a duty to act, his illegal omission to act renders him liable to punishment.²⁰

33. The word "act" denotes as well a series of acts as a single act: the word "omission" denotes as well a series of omissions as a single omission.

COMMENT.

The word 'act' is nowhere defined. It must necessarily be something short of a transaction which is composed of a series of acts but cannot, in ordinary language, be restricted to every separate willed movement of a human being; for when we speak of an act of shooting or stabbing, we mean the action taken as a whole, and not the numerous separate movements involved.²¹

The effect of s. 32 and this section taken together is that the term 'act' comprises one or more acts or one or more illegal omissions.

Where an accused person commits two (or more) acts, closely following upon and intimately connected with each other, they cannot be separated and assigned, the one to one intention and the other to another, but both must be ascribed to the original intention which prompted the commission of those acts and without which neither could have been done.²²

An act may constitute an offence under two or more enactments.²³

34. When a criminal act is done by several persons,¹ in furtherance of the common intention of all,² each of such persons is liable for that act in the same manner as if it were done by him alone.³

Acts done by several persons in furtherance of common intention.

COMMENT.

This section lays down a principle of joint liability in the doing of a criminal act. The essence of that liability is to be found in the existence of a common intention animating the accused leading to the doing of a criminal act in furtherance of such intention.²⁴ It deals with the doing of separate acts, similar or diverse, by several persons; if all are done in furtherance of a common intention, each person is liable for the result of them all as if he had done them himself; for "that act" and "the act" in the latter part of the section must include the whole action covered by a "criminal act" in the first part, because they refer to it.²⁵ The section does not create a distinct offence; it lays down only a principle of criminal liability.¹

As to the distinction between this section and s. 149, see Comment on the latter section.

Sections 33, 34, 37 and 38 should be read together.

Object.—This section is framed to meet a case in which it may be difficult to distinguish between the acts of individual members of a party or to prove exactly what part was taken by each of them.² The reason why all are deemed guilty in such cases is, that the presence of accomplices gives encouragement, support, and protection to the person actually committing the act.

Principle.—This section embodies the common-sense principle that if two or more persons intentionally do a thing jointly it is just the same as if each of them had done it individually.³ If two or more persons combine in injuring another in such a manner that each person engaged in causing the injury must know that the result of such injury may be the death of the injured person, it is no answer on the part of any one of them to allege, and perhaps prove, that his individual act did not cause death, and that by his individual act he cannot be held to have intended death. Every one must be taken to have intended the probable and natural results of the combination of acts in which he joined.⁴ All are guilty of the principal offence, not of abetment.⁵ But a party not cognizant of the intention of his companion to commit murder is not liable, though in his company, to do an unlawful act.⁶ For instance, "if three persons go out to commit a felony, and one of them, unknown to the other, puts a pistol in his pocket and commits a felony of another kind, such as murder, the two who did not concur in this second felony will not be guilty thereof, notwithstanding it happened while they were engaged with him in the felonious act for which they went out."⁷

Scope.—This section is restricted to common intention and does not embrace any knowledge.⁸ It does not require proof that any particular accused was responsible for the commission of the actual offence.⁹ It is not restricted to meet a case in which it may be difficult to distinguish between the acts of individual members of a party or to prove exactly what part was taken by each of them. It can well be applied to cases in which the offence is committed by only one of two or three persons who all had a common intention.¹⁰

It provides not only for liability to punishment, but also for subjection to another jurisdiction. If a foreigner in a foreign territory initiates an offence which is completed within British territory, he is, if found within British territory, liable to be tried by the British Court within whose jurisdiction the offence was completed.¹¹

This section has no application in the construction of ss. 397¹² and 398, though it may be read with ss. 392 and 395 to determine the substantive offence which is created.¹³ It cannot be used to make a co-accused liable to the minimum punishment laid down in s. 397 because one accused is so liable.¹⁴

The Calcutta High Court has held that this section applies to a case under the second part of s. 304.¹⁵ On the other hand the Allahabad High Court is of the opinion that in order to make this section applicable to the second part of s. 304, it will be necessary to widen it in terms of s. 149. Until that is done, accused persons cannot be found guilty under s. 304, second part, read with this section.¹⁶ Similarly, the Judicial Commissioner's Court, Peshawar, has held that the provisions of this section cannot be applied to an offence under the second part of s. 304. This section provides for the punishment of acts which are done with a common intention by more than one person, whereas the second part of s. 304 applies only to acts where there was no intention to cause death but only knowledge that death would be caused.¹⁷

1. 'Criminal act is done by several persons'.—The section contemplates the case where more persons than one share in the doing of the act, and it is necessary to bear in mind the definition of 'act' given in s. 33 and also the provisions of ss. 35, 37 and 38.¹⁸ The term 'act' contemplates a series of acts done by several persons, some perhaps by one of those persons and some by another, but all in pursuance of a common intention.¹⁹ A 'criminal' act means that unity of criminal behaviour which results in something, for which an individual would be punishable, if it were all done by himself alone, that is, in a criminal offence.²⁰

The section only comes into operation when there is a substantive charge of an offence having been committed.²¹

2. 'In furtherance of the common intention of all'.—The words 'in furtherance of the common intention of all' have introduced as an essential part of the section the element of a common intention prescribing the condition under which each might be criminally liable when there are several actors.²² 'Common intention' is an intention to commit the crime actually committed and each accused person can be convicted of that crime, only if he has participated in that common intention.²³ The Privy Council has held that it must be shown that the criminal act complained against was done by one of the accused persons in furtherance of the common intention of all ; if this is shown, then liability for the crime may be imposed on any one of the persons in the same manner as if the act were done by him alone 'Common intention' within the meaning of the section implies a prearranged plan, and to convict the accused of an offence applying the section it should be proved that the criminal act was done in concert pursuant to the prearranged plan. It is difficult if not impossible to procure direct evidence to prove the intention of an individual; in most cases it has to be inferred from his act or conduct or other relevant circumstances of the case.²⁴ Same or similar intention must not be confused with common intention ; the partition which divides "their bounds" is often very thin ; nevertheless, the distinction is real and substantial, and if overlooked, will result in miscarriage of justice. The inference of common intention should never be reached unless it is a necessary inference deducible from the circumstances of the case.²⁵

The Privy Council case, according to the Madras High Court, is warrant only for the proposition that it is not enough to attract the provisions of this section that there was the same intention on the part of several people to commit a particular criminal act or a similar intention but it is necessary before the section could come into play that there must be a prearranged plan in pursuance of which the criminal act was done. Their Lordships do not rule out the possibility of a common intention developing in the course of events though it might not have been present to start with, nor do they say that the intention cannot be inferred from the conduct of the assailants. The question whether there was such an intention or not will have to depend in many cases on inferences to be drawn from proved facts and not on any direct evidence about a preconceived scheme or plan which may not be available at all.¹ Mahmood, J., in *Dharam Rai's case*² said : "This section was the subject of consideration impliedly in the case of Queen v. Gorachand Gopee.³ At p. 456, Sir Barnes Peacock clearly laid down the rule of law that mere presence of persons at the scene of an offence is not, ipso facto, sufficient to render them liable to any rule such as s. 34 enunciates, and that 'the furtherance of a common design' was an essential condition before such a rule applied to the case of an individual person. It was probably in consequence of this expression of view from such a high authority that the Legislature by s. 1 of Act XXVII of 1870, repealed the original s. 34 ; and in substituting another section therefor, inserted the important words 'in furtherance of the common intention of all', as representing the condition precedent to each of such persons being held liable for the crime in the same manner as if it were committed by him alone. This change in the law is very significant, and it indicates to my mind that the original section having been found to be somewhat imperfectly worded, these additional words were introduced to draw a clear distinction that unpremeditated acts done by a particular individual, and which go beyond the object and intention of the original offence, should not implicate persons who take no part in that particular act. We have the opinion of an American jurist on the point, whom Mr. Mayne, in his Commentary on the Indian Penal Code, quotes (Bishop, s. 439), where that learned author, laying down the rule, goes on to say :—'But if the wrong done was a fresh and independent wrong, springing wholly from the mind of the doer, the other is not criminal therein, merely because when it was done he was intending to be a partaker with the doer in a different wrong'. This seems to me to be the right interpretation of the words 'in furtherance of the common intention of all' as they occur in s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code. There is another section in that Code which is somewhat similarly worded, and seems to turn upon the same principle, so far as this particular point is concerned. That section is 149, which, instead of using the words quoted above, uses the words 'in prosecution of the common object of that assembly, or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object.' It will be observed that while s. 34 limits itself to the furtherance of the common intention, s. 149 goes further, inasmuch as it renders every member of an unlawful assembly guilty of the offence when it is likely that such an offence might have been committed in prosecution of the common object. I have referred to this section to show that it is more strongly worded than s. 34; and even upon this section a full bench of the Calcutta High Court in *Queen v. Sabed Ali*⁴ held that any sudden and unpremeditated act done by a member of an unlawful assembly would not render all the other members liable therefor, unless it was shown that the assembly did understand and realize either that such offence would be committed or was likely to be necessary for the common object". Thus to establish guilt under s. 34 it is necessary to prove a common intention as distinguished from a common object as in s. 149 and it must be shown that the criminal act was committed in furtherance of that intention.⁵ The words 'common intention' in s. 34 and 'common object' in s. 149 are not synonymous. The object of an assembly as a whole may not be the same as the intention which several persons may have when in pursuance of that intention they perform a criminal act and it may well be that the object of the assembly was lawful whereas the intention common to those of the assembly who jointly committed a criminal act was in itself criminal and the joint criminal act must be equally imputed to all of them. The accused with some others were convicted by a Magistrate under s. 326 read with s. 149. The Sessions Judge found that the element of an unlawful common object in the assembly as a whole which is required to convict the accused persons under s. 326 read with s. 149 was wanting, but as the accused had the common intention to cause grievous hurt he convicted them under s. 326 read with this section, without framing a specific charge on those sections. It was held that the conviction was not bad.⁶

A furtherance of a common design is a condition precedent for convicting each of the persons who take part in the commission of a crime, and the mere fact that several persons took part in a crime in the absence of a common intention is not sufficient to convict them of that crime. Thus, where several persons joined together in striking another but there was no evidence to show that the common intention of all was to cause grievous hurt⁷ or murder,⁸ the conviction of all of them for the same offence was held to be bad in law. It is not sufficient for joint responsibility for an offence under this section that the offence actually committed was likely to occur as a result of the several persons acting together; but that the existence of a common intention being the sole test of joint responsibility it must be proved what the common intention was and that the common act for which the accused were to be made responsible was acted upon in furtherance of that common intention.⁹ The presumption of constructive intention must not be too readily applied or pushed too far. The mere fact that a man may think a thing likely to happen is vastly different from his intending that that thing should happen. The latter ingredient is necessary under this section, the former by itself is irrelevant to the section. It is only when a Court can with some judicial certitude hold that a particular accused must have pre-conceived or premeditated the result which ensued, or acted in concert with others in order to bring about that result, that this section may be applied.¹⁰ If several persons have the common intention of doing a particular criminal act and in furtherance of that common intention all of them join together or abet each other in the commission of the act, then although one of these persons may not actually with his own hand do the act, if he helps by his presence or by his other acts in the commission of the act, he would be held to have done that act within the meaning of this section.¹¹ The mere fact that a particular accused was not present throughout the beating of the deceased would not absolve him from the liability of the consequences of the beating if the actual type of the beating be held to be in furtherance of the common intention of all.¹² Where five men assault at one and the same time, each of them seeing that the other four are assaulting also, the assault may be regarded as a common one though the impulse to assault may have arisen independently.¹³ When on a quarrel starting up, one person calls upon his companions to beat his opponent, and they cause hurt to him, the person at whose instance the beating is started is, under this section, equally guilty of an offence under s. 323, along with those who give the actual beating.¹⁴

The fact that a criminal act done in furtherance of the common intention of several persons was the act of a single individual does not render the provisions of this section inapplicable.¹⁵

Where the accused is one of the participators in a joint criminal action in the course of which a murder is committed, his temporary absence when the murder is committed will not free him from guilt under this section.¹⁶

This section will not apply if the fight has begun suddenly, and every person who took part in the fight would be taken to be responsible for his individual acts. But where there is proof that some of the persons taking part in the fight, which has suddenly arisen, go and jointly commit an offence and there are indications that their joint object was to commit that offence, there is no bar for the Courts to hold that they had formed a joint intention there and then to do the act of violence.¹⁷

The Court of Criminal Appeal in England has held that where in pursuance of a common design to commit robbery with violence, one prisoner strikes a blow which results in death, and another is present aiding and abetting the robbery, as a principal in the second degree, both are guilty of murder although the latter may have consented to the use of only a limited degree of violence and the former may have departed from the agreed method of attack.¹⁸

Cases—Common intention.—Where each of several persons took part in beating a person so as to break eighteen ribs and cause his death, each of them was convicted of murder.¹⁹ A party of the accused consisting of three opened fire on the party of the deceased in revenge for an insult of which the brother of the deceased was originally guilty. The shots fired by the accused did not hit any one but his two companions fired and hit the deceased. It was held that the accused was guilty of murder.²⁰ Where several persons joined in beating another with lathis (sticks), and inflicted such injuries on him that he died shortly after the beating, all were held guilty of murder without distinction.²¹ The common intention must cover the act done by all the several persons.²² Where four persons formed themselves into a body with the common object of beating the complainant, and while two of them assaulted him the other two stood by ready armed with lathis to take part in the assault, if necessary, it was held that the latter two were equally guilty with the others of an offence under s. 353.²³ Where of three accused connected with one another and living together at the same place, one of them grappled with an eye witness so that he might not rescue the deceased from the clutches of the other two, it was held that this fact justified the inference that the murder was committed in furtherance of the common intention of all the accused.²⁴ Where several accused were all concerned in a case of torture, and were prosecuting a common object, each was held guilty as a principal, and not as an abettor of others.²⁵

The appellant was charged under s. 302 with the murder of a Post-master. At the trial the evidence showed that while the Post-master was in his office counting money, three men, of whom the appellant was one, fired pistols at him after having called upon him to hand over the money; he was hit in two places and died. The trial Judge directed the jury that if they were satisfied that the Post-master was killed in furtherance of the common intention of all three men, then the appellant was guilty of murder, whether he fired the fatal shot or not. It was held by the Privy Council that having regard to ss. 33, 37 and 38, the direction was correct.¹ Where five persons armed with big sticks or clubs joined together to forcibly carry off a girl and grievous hurt was caused to persons attempting to prevent the girl being carried off by any one of them, it was held that all must be regarded as being responsible for the hurt caused.² Where four persons armed with heavy sticks came up with the set purpose of making a serious onslaught on three brothers who were grazing their flocks of sheep, goats and other cattle, and inflicted a number of fatal blows, with the result that two of them became insensible and died soon after, and the third, though he did not lose consciousness, could not move, it was held that all the accused were guilty of culpable homicide even although it was not known as to who struck the fatal blow.³ The accused, who were armed with guns and had plenty of ammunition, entered a shop for the purpose of committing robbery and were disturbed in their act by a large number of villagers. They decided to retreat and in so retreating they fired a large number of shots and one of the pursuers was killed. It was held that though their primary intention was to effect their escape and not to kill any of their pursuers, still it must be concluded from the circumstances that their intention was to effect their escape even though for that purpose it was necessary to shoot any of the pursuers mortally, and that the other accused should be convicted under s. 302 read with this section or s. 114.⁴ Three persons proceeding along a road at a late hour of the night were challenged and on the arm of one of them being pulled, he let fall a bundle containing disguise caps. Each was then caught by the arm by a man whereupon the two companions of the accused shot their captors with revolvers. The two who fired shots escaped and the accused, who was secured after a struggle, was found to have on his person a dagger which he tried to use and a knuckle-duster. It was held that the reasonable inference from the circumstances was that the accused and his two companions had set forth for the purpose of committing some crime of violence involving the use of the weapons they carried, that each knew how the others were armed, that at the time of the shooting they had acted in concert and had the common intention of murdering persons who had seized them in order to make good their escape, and that consequently the accused was constructively guilty of murder.⁵ Where a party of men set out towards a field, with the common intention of attacking another party of men and preventing them from irrigating the field from a well, and one of the attacking party had a gun and the others had heavy sticks and all of them attacked the other party with the result that two persons died of gun shot wounds and others received different injuries, it was held that all the participants in the attack could be convicted of murder.⁶ Where the accused and his son attacked the deceased who succumbed to the injuries, and it was put forward in defence of the accused that the sole common intention of the accused and his son was to cause grievous hurt to the deceased by the use of a spear and long bamboo, and that thereafter when the accused's actions had ceased, the son proceeded to stab the deceased to death whilst the accused stood aside and took no further part in the matter, it was held that the intentions and actions of the accused and his son could not be divided into two parts and the accused was guilty of murder.⁷ Where the common intention of four accused was to commit robbery and one of them went to fetch the owner of the house from his fields in order to threaten him to surrender the property, and one of the remaining three, in the absence of the first, shot down the son of the owner who came to the house suspecting foul play, it was held that the accused who was absent when the murder was committed was one of the participants in the joint criminal action in the course of which the murder was committed and was guilty of murder.⁸ Eleven persons formed an unlawful assembly with the common intention of beating the complainant. Four members chased the complainant and beat him, one of them inflicting a grievous injury with a weapon. While the complainant was being beaten some people came to his rescue and the other members of the assembly beat them. It was held that all the members of the unlawful assembly were liable to be convicted of the offences of causing hurt with a dangerous weapon (s. 326) and rioting (s. 147).⁹

Where both master and servant were present at the sale of ganja (an intoxicating drug) in contravention of the terms of his licence and the servant received the money paid for the ganja, it was held that the servant was guilty of the offence of selling ganja without a licence by the operation of this section.¹⁰

No common intention.—Where three persons assaulted the deceased and gave him a beating, in the course of which one struck him a blow on the head, which resulted in death, it was held that, in the absence of proof that the accused had the common intention to inflict injury likely to cause death, they could not be convicted of murder but of voluntarily causing grievous hurt.¹¹ One D was killed by a blow on his head with some sharp weapon. The accused B and M with others armed with gandas had invaded the compound where D was sleeping, and had immediately assaulted D, and one of their number struck him on the head and killed him. The accused's intention was to insult and disgrace one K. The accused M, who gave the fatal blow, was convicted under s. 302 and B was convicted of abetment of grievous hurt under s. 325 read with s. 109. As both the accused had armed themselves with deadly weapons B must have known that in case of opposition the weapons would be used and in all probability grievous hurt would be caused.¹² In a fight which ensued over the division of property between three persons, one of them was hit by a lathi (heavy stick) and died. It did not appear which of the other two had struck the blow which caused his death. It was held that the accused were not acting in concert and none of them could be convicted of murder.¹³ During the course of a political trial police were posted in different places in the Court to keep order. Large crowds gathered, and some men, who were not permitted to go into the Court room, had some sort of melee with the police. Several men were seen assaulting individual policemen in different parts of the premises. It was held that each assault was independent of other similar assaults and this section had no application as the assaults on individual policemen were not the result of attack on the police.¹⁴ A gang of persons making preparations to commit dacoity was discovered in the limits of a certain village and was pursued by villagers who seized and arrested two accused who were members of the gang. Shortly afterwards, a dacoit at large fired a gun and killed one of the villagers. The accused were thereupon tried for the offence of murder. It was held that the accused were not guilty of murder, for the separation of the two accused from the gang having been prior to the murder, there could be no common object.¹⁵ When the common intention of the accused as established on the record was not to commit murder but to carry off a woman, and on intervention by the complainant party, the accused set upon the complainant party, each accused was responsible for his act and in case of death of one of the complainant party, only that accused was responsible for the death who had caused the fatal blow.¹⁶

The Rangoon High Court has held that where it is not established that there was a common intention among the robbers to commit murder, if necessary, then this section does not apply and such intention cannot be presumed. It would be going very far to hold, that because a man takes part in a robbery in which some of the robbers are armed with deadly weapons it can be presumed that he thereby becomes a party to an intention to kill any person who may happen to resist them in carrying out the robbery. Of course, when a man accompanies robbers, who are armed with such weapons, he must know it to be likely that a murder will be committed if the attempt to rob is resisted, but further than that, it is not safe to go. Knowledge is not the same thing as intention.¹⁷

English cases.—Where Lord Dacre agreed with several persons to hunt in another's park for deer, and to kill all who might resist, one of the party having killed the keeper, all were held to be guilty of the murder, though Lord Dacre was a quarter of a mile distant, and knew nothing of the individual blow.¹⁸

Three soldiers went together to rob an orchard; two got upon a pear tree, and the third stood at the gate with a drawn sword in his hand. The owner's son coming by collared the man at the gate and asked him what business he had there and thereupon the soldier stabbed him. It was held that he had committed murder, but that those on the tree were innocent. It would have been otherwise if they had all come thither with a general resolution against all opposers.¹⁹ Two soldiers came at eleven o'clock at night to a publican's, and demanded beer, which he refused, alleging the unreasonableness of the hour; whereupon they went away uttering imprecations. Some time after one of them rushed in, the other remaining out, and renewed his demand for beer. On his refusing to depart the landlord pushed him towards the outer door where the other soldier gave the landlord a violent blow with a sharp instrument on the head. The landlord died after a few days. It was held that both the soldiers had committed murder, notwithstanding the previous struggle between the landlord and one of them.²⁰

Both of two persons, in pursuit of a common purpose, may be guilty of criminal negligence by driving, although only one of them actually drives.²¹

3. 'Each of such persons is liable for that act in the same manner as if it were done by him alone'.—The words "that act" include the whole action covered by "a criminal act" in the first part of the section.²² "Prove the common intention of the persons present at the commission of the offence and all would be equally guilty of nothing less than that offence. If death were the result of the act or series of acts of one out of several confederates, the act would be done by them all within the meaning of [this section]. If death followed the different acts of different confederates at the same time and place, then again [this section] would probably suffice. Every confederate would be regarded as having done every criminal act and would therefore be liable as if he had done them all alone. The responsibility is mutual."²³

One usually meets with three classes of cases of fatal assault where the question of the joint responsibility of the several assailants arises, viz., (1) where several persons join in the assault and inflict numerous injuries on their victim and the cumulative effect of all or some of the injuries is to cause death ; (2) where several persons commit the assault and inflict minor injuries, but one of them deals a fatal blow and there is evidence of the latter's guilt ; (3) where several persons beat a man and inflict minor injuries on him but one of the assailants deals a fatal blow and the evidence leaves it in doubt as to who struck the fatal blow. In the first case all the assailants are responsible for the fatal assault. In the second case the man who is shown by the evidence to have dealt the fatal blow is alone responsible. In the third case where the evidence leaves it in doubt as to who dealt the fatal blow, none of the assailants is responsible for the fatal blow.²⁴

Mere presence does not raise presumption of complicity.—Although a man is present when a felony is committed if he takes no part in it, and does not act in concert with those who commit it, he will not be a principal merely because he did not endeavour to prevent it, or to apprehend the felon. All who are present do not necessarily assist by their presence every act that is done in their presence, nor are consequently liable to be punished as principals.²⁵ There must be community of design to make the person present liable.¹ The mere circumstance of a person being present on a lawful occasion does not, therefore, raise a presumption of that person's complicity in an offence then committed.²

Amendment.—The words “ in furtherance of the common intention of all ” were introduced by Act XXVII of 1870, s. 1.

PRACTICE.

Calcutta rule.—When several persons are accused of the commission of the same offence, it would be obviously inconvenient if a Magistrate were to punish some and commit others to the Court of Session ; and, as the Code does not seem to contemplate such procedure, the Magistrate should, if he considers the case to be one for the Sessions, commit all those concerned for trial before that tribunal.³

Conviction of substantive offence when there is charge under this section.—When several persons are charged with any offence read with this section, the conviction of one only of the offence itself, apart from this section, is legal, even when all the rest are acquitted.⁴

Finding of definite acts by several accused necessary.—Before any accused can be convicted of an offence read with this section, the Court must arrive at a finding as to which of the accused took what part, if any, in furtherance of the common intention. A conviction without such a finding is illegal.⁵ Two accused were charged with murder. The jury acquitted them of this charge but found that one of them brought himself within exception 4 to s. 300. It was held that when once the jury were satisfied that one of the accused had brought himself within exception 4, there was no room for the application of this section against the other at all.⁶ The common intention may be inferred from the circumstances disclosed in the evidence, and need not be the subject of an express agreement between the persons concerned. In combinations of this kind a mortal stroke though given by one of the party is deemed in the eye of the law to have been given by every individual present and abetting. The person actually giving the stroke is no more than the hand or instrument by which the others strike.⁷

In order to convict accused under this section constructively, it is not necessary to find that he actually committed any overt act. But there must be clear evidence of some action or conduct on his part to establish that he shared in the common intention of committing the offence.⁸

Direct motive not material.—The question of motive is not material where there is direct evidence of the acts of the accused and the acts themselves are sufficient to disclose the intention of the actor.⁹

Specific charge.—The Lahore High Court has held that this section does not create any offence and it is not necessary to specify it in the charge.¹⁰ Where the accused persons were charged and convicted by a Magistrate for an offence under s. 326 read with s. 149, but on appeal the Sessions Judge altered the conviction to one under s. 326 read with s. 34, it was held by the Patna High Court that the conviction was not bad by reason of the absence of a specific charge under this section.¹¹ In considering the legality of the conviction in such circumstances the test is whether the facts which it was necessary to prove and on which evidence was given of the charge upon which the accused was actually tried are the same as the facts upon which he was convicted.¹²

The Allahabad High Court has, however, held that where the prosecution invokes the aid of this section for holding one person responsible for the result produced by the act of another, it is necessary to frame a charge under that section. Omission to do so is a vital defect and the result is that a man can be held responsible only for the result of an act committed by himself.¹³

There is in law no distinction between a charge under s. 379 and a charge under that section read with this section: The latter section is a mere statement of explanation to be attached to any section which deals with a criminal offence.¹⁴

Concession that common intention cannot be inferred.—A concession by the Public Prosecutor that common intention cannot be inferred cannot stand in the way of the appellate Court setting aside a conviction based on such a concession.¹⁵

35. Whenever an act, which is criminal only by reason of its being done with a criminal knowledge or intention, is done by several persons, each of such persons who joins in the act with such knowledge or intention is liable for the act in the same manner as if the act were done by him alone with that knowledge or intention.

When such an act is criminal by reason of its being done with a criminal knowledge or intention.

COMMENT.

This section follows as a corollary from s. 32. The legal consequences of an 'act' and of an 'omission' being the same, if an act is committed partly by an act and partly by an omission the consequences will be the same as if the offence was committed by an 'act' or by an 'omission' alone.

The preceding section provides for a case in which a criminal act was done by several persons in furtherance of the common intention of all. Under this section a person assisting the accused, who actually performs the act, must be shown to have the particular intent or knowledge if the act is criminal only by reason of its being done with a criminal knowledge or intention.

If several persons, having one and the same criminal intention or knowledge, jointly commit murder or an assault, each is liable for the offence as if he had acted alone: but if several persons join in an act, each having a different intention or knowledge from the others, each is liable according to his own criminal intention or knowledge, and he is not liable further.

If an act which is an offence in itself and without reference to any criminal knowledge or intention on the part of the doers is done by several persons, each of such persons is liable for the offence.

This section makes it clear that where a number of persons join in an act which is criminal only by reason of its being done with a certain knowledge or intention, each person is liable for the act to the extent of his knowledge or intention : in other words, the Court or the jury have to consider what is the knowledge or intention with which each person joined in the act.¹⁶ A and B beat C who dies. A intended to murder him and knew that the act would cause death. B only intended to cause grievous hurt and did not know his act would cause death or such bodily injury as was likely to result in death. A is guilty of murder and B of causing grievous hurt.¹⁷

36. Wherever the causing of a certain effect, or an attempt to cause that effect, by an act or by an omission, is an offence, it is to be understood that the causing of that effect partly by an act and partly by an omission is the same offence.

partly by omission.

ILLUSTRATION.

A intentionally causes Z's death, partly by illegally omitting to give Z food, and partly by beating Z. A has committed murder.

COMMENT.

This section shows that when an offence is the effect partly of an act or partly of an omission, it is one offence only.¹⁸

37. When an offence is committed by means of several acts, whoever intentionally co-operates in the commission of that offence by doing any one of those acts, either singly or jointly with any other person, commits that offence.

Co-operation by

(a) A and B agree to murder Z by severally and at different times giving him small doses of poison. A and B administer the poison according to the agreement with intent to murder Z. Z dies from the effects of the several doses of poison so administered to him. Here A and B intentionally co-operate in the commission of murder and as each of them does an act by which the death is caused, they are both guilty of the offence though their acts are separate.

(b) A and B are joint jailors, and as such, have the charge of Z, a prisoner, alternately for six hours at a time. A and B, intending to cause Z's death, knowingly co-operate in causing that effect by illegally omitting, each during the time of his attendance, to furnish Z with food supplied to them for that purpose. Z dies of hunger. Both A and B are guilty of the murder of Z.

(c) A, a jailor, has the charge of Z, a prisoner. A, intending to cause Z's death, illegally omits to supply Z with food; in consequence of which Z is much reduced in strength, but the starvation is not sufficient to cause his death. A is dismissed from his office, and B succeeds him. B, without collusion or co-operation with A, illegally omits to supply Z with food, knowing that he is likely thereby to cause Z's death. Z dies of hunger. B is guilty of murder, but, as A did not co-operate with B, A is guilty only of an attempt to commit murder.

COMMENT.

This section provides that, when several acts are done so as to result together in the commission of an offence, the doing of any one of them, with an intention to co-operate in the offence (which may not be the same as an intention common to all), makes the actor liable to be punished for the commission of the offence.¹⁹

This section follows as a corollary from s. 35 as will appear from the illustrations.

It overlaps s. 34, but it applies also to acts which are separate and which are not necessarily part of a series. The distinction between s. 34 and this section is that while the former requires a common intention for a criminal act done by several persons, in which case each actor becomes liable as if that act were done by him alone. This section deals with intentional co-operation in an offence committed by means of several acts, and punishes such co-operation as if it constituted the offence itself.²⁰ The words "several acts" in this section read with s. 38 may mean "several series of acts". Thus, if it is sought to make two persons A and B responsible for an offence under s. 34, the terms of this section might meet an objection that the individual acts of A and B were not of such a nature that they could be called a series.

We have seen that if several persons combine both in intent and act, each is answerable for the joint criminal act just as if he alone had done it; and so it is if each person has his several parts to do, the whole contributing to one result. It is immaterial what particular share is allotted to each, or whether the object be accomplished jointly by all present at the same time and place, or each performs his own part separately. Where all concur in effecting the criminal result, each does the act so far as his own part extends, and, as to the residue, may be regarded as causing it to be done by means of a guilty agent. All the persons concerned stand in the mutual relation of principals and agents to each other. If, for instance, several persons combine to forge an instrument, and each executes by himself a distinct part of the forgery, and they are not together when the instrument is completed, they are nevertheless all guilty as principals.²¹ Where two persons are acting in concert in the sense that their attack on the deceased (with a heavy stick by the one, and with a heavy stone by the other) is a single indivisible thing, both of them are liable for the resultant murder.²² Three persons, brothers, attacked with heavy sticks a fourth, against whom they bore a grudge, and beat him with great severity, so that he died shortly afterwards. His skull was badly fractured, and numerous other injuries were inflicted upon him. It did not appear which injuries were caused by which of the assailants, but the evidence showed that they were acting in concert and intended to cause such bodily injury as was likely to cause death. It was held that all the three assailants were guilty of murder.²³

Persons concerned in criminal act may be guilty of different offences.

38. Where several persons are engaged or concerned in the commission of a criminal act, they may be guilty of different offences by means of that act.

ILLUSTRATION.

A attacks Z under such circumstances of grave provocation that his killing of Z would be only culpable homicide not amounting to murder. B having ill-will towards Z and intending to kill him, and not having been subject to the provocation, assists A in killing Z. Here, though A and B are both engaged in causing Z's death, B is guilty of murder, and A is guilty only of culpable homicide.

COMMENT.

This section provides for different punishments for different offences as an alternative to one punishment for one offence, whether the persons engaged or concerned in the commission of a criminal act are set in motion by the one intention or by the other.²⁴

Sections 34, 35 and 38 deal with the same subject and should be read together. Section 34 treats of acts done with a 'common intention', s. 38, of acts done with different intentions. A quarrel arose between C on the one side and A and B on the other. C abused A, whereupon A struck him with a stick, and B struck him down with an axe on the head. He also received two other wounds with the axe on other parts of the body. Any one of the three axe-wounds was sufficient to cause death, more especially that on the head. It was held that B was guilty of culpable homicide, while A was guilty of voluntarily causing hurt.²⁵

Section 38 would cover two different situations. One is where several persons act together in furtherance of a common intention, as in the illustration to the section. In such a situation, the section provides that the Court may convict each person of a different offence, according as circumstances operate to create legal extenuation in individual cases. The other situation is where there is action in common but a difference in the several intentions of the participants. In that case the section is a converse to s. 34, and each person is to be found guilty of the particular offence constituted by his individual act. In the first case, however, the section is a supplement to s. 34, not a converse.

Sections 34 to 38 lay down principles similar to the English law of "principals in the first and second degrees". See Comment on s. 107, infra.

39. A person is said to cause an effect "voluntarily" when he causes it by means¹ whereby he intended to cause it, or by means which, at the time of employing those means, he knew or had reason to believe to be likely to cause it.

ILLUSTRATION.

A sets fire, by night, to an inhabited house in a large town, for the purpose of facilitating robbery, and thus causes the death of a person. Here, A may not have intended to cause death, and may even be sorry that death has been caused by his act: yet, if he knew that he was likely to cause death, he has caused death voluntarily.

COMMENT.

The word 'voluntarily' is defined in relation to the causation of effects and not to the doing of acts from which those effects result. It has been given a peculiar meaning, differing widely from its ordinary meaning, in the Code.

In general, the Code makes no distinction between cases in which a man causes an effect designedly and cases in which he causes it knowingly or having reason to believe that he is likely to cause it. If the effect is a probable consequence of the means used by him he causes it 'voluntarily', whether he really meant to cause it or not. He is not allowed to urge that he did not know or was not sure that the consequence would follow; but he must answer for it just as if he had intended to cause it. The English law by means of an artificial presumption, viz. that a man is presumed to intend the natural or probable consequences of his own act, gives to the words which denote intention the meaning here annexed to 'voluntarily'.¹ See s. 81, infra.

The definition of the term 'voluntarily' bears resemblance to the definition of 'wilfully', current in the English law. An injury shall be deemed to be 'wilfully' caused whensoever the person from whose act or omission such injury results, whether he directly intended it to result from his act or omission, or believing that it was in any degree probable that such injury would result from his act or omission, incurred the risk of causing such injury.²

"The principle of exemption from criminal responsibility in respect of a hurtful consequence is that of bona fide ignorance of the connexion existing between the mere mechanical act and its consequence. That principle ceases to operate where the connexion is known to be either certain or probable. If the doer of an act know or believe that a noxious consequence will result from that act, he is just as culpable, both in Law and Morals as if he had acted with the most direct intention to hurt. Let it however be supposed that the consequence is not certain, but that it is a likely or probable consequence, and that the likelihood or probability is known to the doer of the act. Here again it is clear that the principle of exemption above mentioned is unavailable to exempt the offender from liability in respect of the consequence. All he can urge is, that he was not sure that the hurtful consequence would follow ; but he had no right to incur the risk and danger of producing the mischief, and having done so is justly responsible for it ; he cannot reasonably complain that the Law did not give him notice of the penalty annexed to the offence, or that he did not wilfully offend, for the Law may justly, after due notification, doom such an offender to the penalties inflicted on those who accomplish their purposes by more certain or direct means ; the safety of society is inconsistent with any distinction in this respect, and the offender in truth acted wilfully, in wilfully incurring the risk and danger of causing the injurious result ”.³

1. ‘ Means ’.—This word signifies acts as well as omissions.

40. Except in the chapters and sections mentioned in clauses two and three of this section, the word “offence”¹ denotes a thing made punishable by this Code.²

In Chapter IV, Chapter VA and in the following sections, namely, sections 64, 65, 66, 67, 71, 109, 110, 112, 114, 115, 116, 117, 187, 194, 195, 203, 211, 213, 214, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 347, 348, 388, 389 and 445, the word “offence” denotes a thing punishable under this Code, or under any special or local law as herein-after defined.

And in sections 141, 176, 177, 201, 202, 212, 216 and 441 the word “offence” has the same meaning when the thing punishable under the special or local law is punishable under such law with imprisonment for a term of six months or upwards, whether with or without fine.

COMMENT.

The word ‘ offence ’ as defined in this section has three sets of meaning as explained in the three clauses of this section.

1. ‘ Offence ’.—This word does not extend to acts punishable under the law of England. Stokes says that the Code is defective in not declaring that in certain sections (e.g., ss. 216, 221, 224, 225), ‘ offence ’ shall include acts and omissions punishable by the law of England.

2. ‘ A thing made punishable by this Code ’.—In S. Moorga Chetty’s case⁴ West, J., remarked : “ If verbal criticism is to have a preponderating influence, I may observe that there is an inaccuracy in section 40. ‘ A thing ’, meaning an act or omission, is not susceptible of punishment. What is meant is ‘ a thing for which he who is guilty of it is punishable ’.” The term ‘ a thing ’ is a rather unhappy substitute for what it seems to mean—“ an aggregate of acts or omissions ”.⁵ A ‘ thing ’ must be an act, or a series of illegal acts, or an illegal omission, or a series of illegal omissions ; or, to use the words of Mr. Bentham “ We give the name of offence to every act which we think ought to be prohibited by reason of some evil which it produces or tends to produce ”.

‘ Punishable ’ must mean that the commission or omission of the act, the commission or omission of which is prohibited, renders the person who commits or omits it liable to the sanction of the law, i.e., to punishment.⁶ This word is “ here used according to a common idiom for ‘ rendering a person liable to punishment ; ’ for it, is obvious that in the strict and primary usage of the word, no thing is punishable and no person since Xerxes, except a child with his doll, has ever supposed otherwise. The expression, therefore, is incomplete ”.⁷ The words ‘ made punishable ’ may be reasonably and rightly read as if they were “declared punishable”.⁸ ‘A thing made punishable’ is no doubt an inaccurate expression. . . . , but ‘punishable’ is here used in a sense which is popularly familiar in the expression “a punishable offence”, that is, “an offence to which a punishment is attached”, and the words ‘a thing made punishable’ mean. . . . an act or omission which by this Code is constituted one to which a punishment is attached.⁹

Under this clause an act or omission is not an ‘offence’ if it is punishable only under some other enactment.¹⁰

Clause 2.—The effect of this clause is to make everything punishable under a special law an offence within the meaning of the Code. Thus, for instance, offences under the Police Act (V of 1861), or the Excise Act (XII of 1896), or the Post Office Act (VI of 1889), or the Explosive Substances Act (VI of 1908), or the Registration Act (XVI of 1908) become also offences under the Penal Code.

Where a local law declares a breach of the rules made under its authority to be punishable, then a breach of such rules might constitute an offence within the meaning of this section.¹¹

Order under s. 55 of the Criminal Procedure Code.—Such an order does not come within the definition of an offence.¹²

Maintenance order.—An order for payment of maintenance is not a conviction for an offence.¹³

Proceeding under s. 28 of Public Conveyances Act.—A proceeding to recover legal fare under s. 28 of the Bombay Public Conveyances Act, 1867, is not a complaint of an offence.¹⁴

Attempt.—An attempt to commit an offence is itself an offence within the definition of ‘offence’ as given in this section; and where no express provision is made in any other part of the Code for the punishment of such offence, it is punishable under s. 511.¹⁵

Abetment.—The abetment of an offence is in itself an offence within the meaning of this section.¹⁶

Amendment.—This section was substituted for the original s. 40 by Act XXVII of 1870, s. 1. The figures 64, 65, 66 and 71 were inserted by Act VIII of 1882, s. 1; and the figure 67, by Act X of 1886, s. 21. The term ‘offence’ is thus, in certain cases, extended to things made punishable under any special or local law. The object of the amendment was to enlarge the scope of the Penal Code by making offences under special laws also offences under the Code.¹⁷ But nothing contained in the amending Act XXVII of 1870 is to be taken to affect any of the provisions of any special or local law (s. 15). The word, figure and letter ‘Chapter VA’ were inserted by Act VIII of 1913. The word ‘chapters’ was substituted for ‘chapter’ by Act VIII of 1930.

41. A “special law” is a law applicable to a particular subject.

The special laws contemplated in s. 40 and this section are only laws, such as the Excise, Opium and Cattle Trespass Acts, creating fresh offences, that is, laws making punishable certain things which are not already punishable under the Penal Code. The Whipping Act is not a special law in this sense; it creates no fresh offences, but merely provides a supplementary or alternative form of punishment for offences which are already punishable primarily under the Penal Code.²¹

42. A "local law" is a law applicable only to a particular part of British India.

"Local law."

COMMENT.

Laws applicable to particular localities are termed local laws, e.g., Port Trust Acts. A local law does not necessarily include all rules made under the provisions of a local law.²² Where a local law declares a breach of the rules made under its authority to be punishable then a breach of such rules might constitute an offence within the meaning of s. 40 of the Code.²³

43. The word "illegal" is applicable to everything which is an offence or which is prohibited by law, or which furnishes ground for a civil action¹: and a person is said to be "legally bound to do" whatever it is illegal in him to omit.

"Illegal".

"Legally bound to do".

COMMENT.

The word "illegal" has been given a very wide meaning as it includes (1) everything which is an offence; (2) everything which is prohibited by law; and (3) everything which furnishes ground for a civil action. The words of this section cover not merely a tort, but also a breach of contract which furnishes ground for a civil action, that is to say, in respect of which damages could be obtained under s. 73 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, or which could be enforced specifically.²⁴ The prohibition in the second case must be legal. The accused submitted to his official superior a false 'nil' return of lands in his enjoyment, and also made a false statement to the same effect in a revenue inquiry. It was held that no offence had been committed as the act of the accused was not 'illegal'.²⁵ He was doubtless guilty of a breach of a departmental order, but he was not legally bound to furnish such information within the meaning of this section. Suppose an official is bound by the rules of his superior to be at his office at 10 a.m. and to enter his name in a book kept for that purpose: he falsely enters his arrival at 10 when he in fact arrived at 11 o'clock; can it be said that he has committed an offence? Certainly not. A breach of a departmental order is not a criminal offence. But if he entered the wrong time for the purpose of creating evidence of a false alibi to be used in Court he will be guilty of fabricating false evidence.

The words 'illegal' and 'unlawful' have the same meaning under the Code.¹ But it does not follow that if one of those words is specially defined, and the other is not, the two words must necessarily have the meaning given to the one word by the definition.² The word 'unlawful', in its general connotation, means what is not justified by law. It is akin to the word "illegal" which is defined in this section but has not the same restricted sense, but has been used in a more elastic manner. It is also not restricted to what is "immoral".³

1. 'Which furnishes ground for a civil action.'—"These appear wide words, but we think it would be difficult to restrict them without the risk of excluding

44. The word "injury" denotes any harm whatever illegally caused to any person, in body, mind, reputation or property.¹

"Injury."

COMMENT.

"Injury" is an act contrary to law.⁵ The word "injury" has been given a wide meaning in this section. It will include every tortious act. Thus an unlawful detention of a cart at a toll-gate caused by an illegal demand for payment of toll amounts to injury.⁶ Threat of a decree which can never be given effect to is a threat of harm to an individual in his person, reputation, or property.⁷ Threat to use the process of law for the purpose of enforcing payment of more than is due is illegal and such a threat made with such an object is a threat of injury.⁸ The threat of a decree that could not be executed by any competent authority is a threat of harm or injury.⁹ But a threat of a social boycott is not a threat of 'injury'.¹⁰

1. 'Property'.—This word here means something in existence and it cannot, with any propriety, be applied to the reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit for the loss of which an action is maintainable by the representatives of a deceased person.¹¹ Where the accused took away the complainant's cattle and declined to release them until he was paid a certain sum and on the receipt of that sum he released them, it was held that he caused 'injury' to the complainant.¹²

Death of husband.—Where a Magistrate imposed a fine in addition to a sentence of imprisonment on a conviction for the offence of causing death by a rash and negligent act and gave compensation to the widow of the deceased out of the fine imposed, it was held that compensation could not be given to her for she did not suffer any injury as here defined.¹³ In view of the amendment in 1923 of s. 545 of the Code of Criminal Procedure which includes the word "loss" this ruling is of no authority now, because compensation could be given to the widow. Nothing could be more harmful to the mind of a woman than the death of her husband and the section speaks of harm to the mind as 'injury.' And it was held by the former Chief Court of the Punjab that loss of her husband's support affected a widow prejudicially in a legal right, and was therefore an injury as defined in the Penal Code.¹⁴

False charge is injury.—A false charge laid before the Police, and never intended to be prosecuted in a Court, may subject the accused to very substantial injury, as here defined.¹⁵

COMMENT.

A year is the time wherein the sun goes around his compass through the twelve signs, or the period in which the revolution of the earth round the sun is completed, viz., 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, and 51.6 seconds. For ordinary purposes the average length of a year is taken to be 365 days. But every fourth year the extra hours are taken into account and the statute 24 Geo. II, c. 25, enacts that the year shall consist of 366 days. The fourth year is called the leap year. By statute 21 Hen. III, the increasing day in the leap year, as well as the preceding day, are counted for one day only. The 1st January is the first day of the year by statute 24 Geo. II, c. 23; before that enactment the 25th March was the first day of the year.

The day on which a sentence is passed on a prisoner is calculated as a whole day. A person sentenced to imprisonment for the space of one calendar month is entitled to be discharged on the day in the succeeding month immediately preceding the day corresponding to that from which his sentence takes effect.¹⁶ On the 31st October the accused was sentenced to be imprisoned for one offence for one calendar month, and for a second offence for a period of fourteen days, commencing after the expiration of the calendar month. Pursuant to his sentence, he was detained in custody until the 14th of December. It was held that the detention was lawful, for as the calendar month did not expire until the 30th of November, he was not entitled to be discharged from the second term of imprisonment until the full period of fourteen days computed from the 1st of December had expired. Denman, J., said: "... I am of opinion that a sentence of imprisonment for one calendar month, passed on any given day of any given month, is to be held to begin to run from the first moment of that day, and to expire upon arriving at the first moment of the corresponding day in the succeeding month. If there be no such corresponding day by reason of the succeeding month not having so many days as the preceding month, then by analogy to the law established in the case of bills of exchange, I think the calendar month should be held to have expired at the last moment of its last day, but as long as there is a day in the calendar numerically corresponding from which the sentence begins to run, so that it is unnecessary to trench upon a succeeding month, I see no ground for anticipating the expiration of the sentence."¹⁷

52. Nothing is said to be done or believed in "good faith" which "Good faith". is done or believed without due care and attention.

COMMENT.

This definition of "good faith" is merely a negative one. It does not define "good faith". It says that an act is only done in good faith if it is done with due care and attention. Absence of good faith means simply carelessness or negligence.²⁰

According to the General Clauses Act,²¹ "A thing shall be deemed to be done in 'good faith' where it is in fact done honestly whether it is done negligently or not." This definition is borrowed from an English statute²² and it differs materially from that contained in this section. Under the definition of the Code the question of honesty is immaterial.

Mere good faith in the sense of simple belief, actual belief, with any grounds for believing, is not sufficient: the belief must be a reasonable, not an absurd, belief, that is, there must be some reasonable ground for it. Good faith in act or belief requires due care and attention to the matter in hand. The law cannot mark, except in this vague way, the amount of care and attention requisite; but if a man takes upon himself an office or duty requiring skill or care, and a question arises whether he has acted therein in good faith, he must show not merely a good intention, but such care and skill as the duty reasonably demands for its due discharge. The degree of care requisite will vary with the degree of danger which may result from the want of care. Where the peril is the greatest the greatest caution is necessary.²³

Good faith requires not logical infallibility, but due care and attention. But how far erroneous actions or statements are to be imputed to want of due care and caution must, in each case, be considered with reference to the general circumstances and the capacity and intelligence of the person, whose conduct is in question.²⁴ The phrase "due care and attention" implies genuine effort to reach the truth and not the ready acceptance of an ill-natured belief. When a question arises as to whether a person acted in good faith, then it devolves upon him to show not merely that he had a good intention but that he exercised such care and skill as the duty reasonably demanded for its due discharge.²⁵

The question of good faith must be considered with reference to the position of the accused and the circumstances under which he acted. The law does not exact the same care and attention from all persons regardless of the position they occupy.¹ It varies in different cases.²

Where a police constable after questioning a person, who was carrying three bundles of cloth under his arms, and receiving unsatisfactory replies, arrested him, it was held that the putting of questions, not for the purpose of causing annoyance, but in order to clear up his suspicions, was an indication of good faith.³ A police-officer, seeing a horse, resembling one which his father had lost a short time previously tied up in B's premises, jumped at once to the conclusion that B had either stolen the horse himself, or had purchased it from the thief. He found that B had bought the animal from one S; so he sent for S and charged him with the theft without taking the trouble of getting any credible information as to whether it was his father's horse or not. It was held that he had acted without exercising due care and attention.⁴ The accused, who was an educated man living in a town where medical atten-

Banky. 1, 2 App. Cas. 616, by Lord Blackburn, between the case of a person who was honestly blundering and careless, and the case of a person who has acted not honestly, that is, not necessarily with the intention to defraud, but not with an honest belief that the transaction was a valid one, and that he was dealing with a good will. The Sale of Goods Act, 1893, (56 & 57 Vic., c. 71), s. 62, gives a similar definition.

dance was available, chained up his brother, who was subject to fits of violent insanity with lucid intervals, for over three months in an unnecessarily cruel way, it was held that he did not act with due care and attention.⁵ A person who permitted his coolies to work in an area which was outside the licensed area at a considerable distance was held to be not acting in good faith.⁶

Where a person, uneducated in matters of surgery, operated on a man for internal piles by cutting them out with an ordinary knife, and the man died from hæmorrhage, it was held that he had not acted in good faith although he had performed similar operations on previous occasions.⁷

Superstitious but rash act.—Where the accused entertained a belief that a stooping child whom he caught sight of in the early gloaming was a spirit or demon, the child being in a place which the accused and his fellow villagers deemed to be haunted, and acting on this belief caused the death of the child by blows he inflicted before he discovered his mistake, it was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under section 304A, for, though he was under a mistake of fact, he did not in good faith, that is, with due care and attention, believe himself justified in doing the act.⁸

52A. Except in section 157, and in section 130 in the case in which the harbour is given by the wife or husband of the person harboured, the word “harbour” includes the supplying a person with shelter, food, drink, money, clothes, arms, ammunition or means of conveyance, or the assisting a person by any means, whether of the same kind as those enumerated in this section or not, to evade apprehension.

COMMENT.

The present section was introduced here and s. 216B was omitted by the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act (VIII of 1942), ss. 2 and 3. Section 216B defined the word “harbour” as used in ss. 212, 216 and 216A of the Code as follows:—“The word ‘harbour’ includes the supplying of a person with shelter, food, drink, money, clothes, arms, ammunition, or means of conveyance, or the assisting a person in any way to evade apprehension.” The definition of ‘harbour’ is given here in an amended form.

The Statement of Objects and Reasons⁹ stated: Section 216B of the Indian Penal Code widens the meaning of the word “harbour” as used in sections 212, 216 and 216A. The word is also used in sections 130, 136 and 157, and as used in those sections bears its narrower dictionary meaning. There is no rational justification for differentiating between the meaning of the word as used in different sections of the Code, and the fact that the word is used in sections other than sections 212, 216 and 216A appears to have been overlooked when section 216B was inserted by Act III of 1894. The fact that the wider meaning does not attach to the word as used in section 130, which provides for the punishment of persons who harbour an escaped prisoner of war, might well produce untoward results in existing circumstances, and it is proposed to render the definition in section 216B applicable to the Code generally by transferring that section to Chapter II of the Code. It is also proposed to insert words in the concluding words of the definition as now contained in section 216B embrace all forms of assistance or only forms of assistance ejusdem generis with those previously mentioned in the section. The Allahabad¹⁰ High Court has held that the meaning is so limited, while the Calcutta¹¹ and Lahore¹² High Courts have taken the contrary view. It is proposed to clarify the point in the sense of the views taken by the Calcutta and Lahore High Courts.”

CHAPTER III.

OF PUNISHMENTS.

Punishments.

53. The punishments to which offenders are liable under the provisions of this Code are,—

First,—Death ;

Secondly,—Transportation ;

Thirdly,—Penal Servitude ;

Fourthly,—Imprisonment, which is of two descriptions, namely :—

(1) Rigorous, that is, with hard labour.

(2) Simple.

Fifthly,—Forfeiture of property ;

Sixthly,—Fine.

COMMENT.

The Court should realize the necessity of a proportion between an offence and a penalty; and should not inflict the maximum term of imprisonment on every offender without any regard to the seriousness or otherwise of the offence committed by him. While apportioning the punishment, it should also take into consideration the circumstances under which the offence was committed and the fact whether the criminal is a first offender or a habitual or professional offender.¹ A Court, in passing sentence, should inflict such sentence as the gravity or otherwise of the crime of which the accused has been convicted warrants and merits, irrespective of whether the sentence inflicted will involve a right of appeal or not, even although the accused may pray for an appealable sentence.²

“The determination of the right measure of punishment is often a point of great difficulty. Hard-and-fast rules cannot be laid down, but the decision must be left to discretion, and discretion has to be guided by a variety of considerations.

“There is the element of vindictiveness, which cannot be left out of sight, notwithstanding what has been said by Plato on the subject. Both personal and public sentiment demand that the person who has made others suffer unjustly, should himself be made to suffer in return. This is quite distinct from the moral side of an act with which properly the Courts have nothing to do. Their concern is solely with the nature of the act viewed as a crime or breach of the law. The law indicates the gravity of the act by the maximum penalty provided for its punishment and the Courts have to judge whether the act committed falls short of the maximum degree of gravity, and, if so, by how much.

“The principal object of punishment, however, is the prevention of offences, and the measure of punishment must, consequently, vary from time to time according to the prevalence of a particular form of crime and other circumstances. An amount of severity may be very appropriate at one time which would be quite uncalled for at another.

“It may generally be taken as a safe principle to follow, that punishments should be made as moderate as is consistent with the object aimed at. Punishment in excess is apt to defeat its own object, and to produce a reaction of popular feeling, as experience shows. To shut a man up in prison longer than is really necessary is not only bad for the man himself, but is a useless piece of cruelty, and economically wasteful and a source of loss to the community.”³

The causing of merely retributive harm, whether by the community or the individual, is itself a crime. Punishment is in itself an evil, justified only by its effects in deterring the offender from a repetition of the offence and in deterring others by the example from the commission of it. In each case punishment must be the least that will produce both these effects.⁴ Courts should exercise discretion in making the penalty fit the crime. The practice of committing petty offenders to the Sessions Court after three or four convictions should cease.⁵

Where, however, a person has shown from his past actions that he intends to adopt a criminal career, three things should be borne in mind : first, it is necessary to pass a sentence upon him which will make him realise that a life of crime becomes increasingly hard, and does not pay; secondly, the sentence should serve as a warning to others who may be thinking of adopting a criminal career; and thirdly, the public must be protected against people who know that they are going to ignore the rules framed for the protection of society.⁶

To the six kinds of punishments mentioned in the section two more are added by subsequent enactments, viz., whipping and detention in reformatories. Penalty is also imposed by a criminal Court by passing an order under s. 106 or s. 565⁷ of the Code of Criminal Procedure. In the Madras Presidency the punishment of stocks is inflicted on offenders of lower castes.⁸

An order under s. 562, Criminal Procedure Code, directing release upon probation of good conduct cannot be said to be a punishment.⁹

1. Death.—The authors of the Code say : “We are convinced that it ought to be very sparingly inflicted, and we propose to employ it only in cases where either murder or the highest offence against the State has been committed.... To the great majority of mankind nothing is so dear as life. And we are of opinion that to put robbers, ravishers and mutilators on the same footing with murderers is an arrangement which diminishes the security of life.... Those offences are almost always committed under such circumstances that the offender has it in his power to add murder to his guilt.... As he has almost always the power to murder, he will often have a strong motive to murder, inasmuch as by murder he may often hope to remove the only witness of the crime which he has already committed. If the punishment of the crime which he has already committed be exactly the same with the punishment of murder, he will have no restraining motive. A law which imprisons for rape and robbery, and hangs for murder, holds out to ravishers and robbers a strong inducement to spare the lives of those whom they have injured. A law which hangs for rape and robbery, and which only hangs for murder, holds out, indeed, if it be rigorously carried into effect, a strong motive to deter men from rape and robbery, but as soon as a man has ravished or robbed, it holds out to him a strong motive to follow up his crime with a murder.”¹⁰

Death is the punishment that must be awarded for murder by a person under sentence of transportation (s. 308). It may be awarded as punishment for the following offences only :—Waging war against the King (s. 121). (2) Abetting mutiny actually committed (s. 132). (3) Giving or fabricating false evidence upon which an innocent person suffers death (s. 194). (4) Murder (s. 302). (5) Abetment of suicide of a minor or insane, or intoxicated person (s. 305). (5) Dacoity accompanied with murder (s. 396). (7) Attempt to murder by a person under sentence of transportation, if hurt is caused (s. 307).

Burma Act.—A child under sixteen years is not to be sentenced to death (Burma Act III of 1930), s. 15. See similar Children's Acts enacted in various provinces in British India.

2. Transportation.—The authors of the Code observe : “The consideration which has chiefly determined us to retain that mode of punishment is our persuasion that it is regarded by the natives of India, particularly by those who live at a distance from the sea, with peculiar fear. The pain which is caused by punishment is unmixed evil. It is by the terror which it inspires that it produces good; and perhaps no punishment inspires so much terror in proportion to the actual pain which it causes as the punishment of transportation in this country. Prolonged imprisonment may be more painful in the actual endurance; but it is not so much dreaded beforehand; nor does a sentence of imprisonment strike either the offender or the bystanders with so much horror as a sentence of exile beyond what they call the Black Water. This feeling, we believe, arises chiefly from the mystery which overhangs the fate of the transported convict. The separation resembles that which takes place at the moment of death. The criminal is taken for ever from the society of all who are acquainted with him, and conveyed by means of which the natives have but an indistinct notion over an element which they regard with extreme awe, to a distant country of which they know nothing, and from which he is never to return. It is natural that his fate should impress them with a deep feeling of terror. It is on this feeling that the efficacy of the punishment depends, and this feeling would be greatly weakened if transported convicts should frequently return, after an exile of seven or fourteen years, to the scene of their offences, and to the society of their former friends."¹¹

In fifty offences under the Code the sentence of transportation is provided.

Transportation for life must be inflicted for (1) unlawful return from transportation (s. 226), and for being a thug (s. 311). Transportation may be inflicted for any term under ss. 121A (conspiracy to wage war) and 124A (sedition). Except in the case of these two offences transportation prescribed is for life.

Age, sex and infirmities, combined with various other circumstances and considerations may frequently render the exercise of a discretion in substituting a moderate sentence of imprisonment for one of transportation.¹²

The Government of Bombay in virtue of a resolution of the Government of India have issued a resolution saying "Instructions should be issued to the prison authorities and the Court should be informed that as far as possible deportation to the Andamans will cease."¹³

Burma Act.—A child under sixteen years is not to be sentenced to transportation (Burma Act III of 1930), s. 15. See similar Children's Acts enacted in various provinces in British India.

3. Penal servitude.—The punishment of penal servitude, which is a substitute for transportation, is applicable only to Europeans and Americans¹⁴ under Act XXIV of 1855 which is based on Stat. 16 & 17 Vic., c. 99. The word "European", as used in this Act, shall be understood to include any person usually designated a European British subject.¹⁵ "By reason of the difficulty of providing a place to which Europeans or Americans can, with safety to their health, be sent for the purpose of undergoing sentences of transportation or of imprisonment for long terms it has become expedient to substitute other punishments for that of transportation."¹⁶

Penal servitude is a punishment which consists in keeping an offender in confinement and compelling him to labour. Persons sentenced to penal servitude are, during the term of the sentence, confined in such prison within British India as the Governor-General in Council directs, and kept to hard labour.¹⁷

See the Penal Servitude Act (XXIV of 1855) set out in the Appendix.

4. Imprisonment.—Imprisonment is of two kinds : rigorous and simple. In the case of rigorous imprisonment the offender is put to hard labour, such as grinding corn, digging earth, drawing water, cutting fire-wood, bowing wool, etc. In the case of simple imprisonment the offender is confined to jail and is not put to any kind of work. Where the Code provides that an offender shall be punished with imprisonment "and shall also be liable to fine," the sentence should include some period of imprisonment, whatever it may be.¹⁸ The definition of 'imprisonment' applies in the case of all Central Acts and Regulations made after the 14th January 1887.¹⁹

The authors of the Code had, in many cases not heinous, fixed a minimum as well as a maximum punishment. The Committee were of opinion that, considering the general terms in which offences were defined, it would be inexpedient, in most cases, to fix a minimum punishment; and they had accordingly so altered the Code as to leave the minimum punishment for all offences, except those of the gravest nature, to the discretion of the Judge who would have the means in each case of forming an opinion as to the character of the offender, and the circumstances, whether aggravating or mitigating, under which the offence had been committed. But with respect to some heinous offences—such as offences against the State, murder, attempt to commit murder, and the like—they had thought it right to fix a minimum punishment.²⁰ Circumstances which are properly and expressly recognized by the law as aggravations calling for increased severity of punishment are principally such as consist in the manner in which the offence is perpetrated; whether it be by forcible or fraudulent means, or by aid of accomplices, or in the malicious motive by which the offender was actuated, or the consequences to the public or to individual sufferers, or the special necessity which exists in particular cases for counteracting the temptation to offend, arising from the degree of expected gratification, or the facility of perpetration peculiar to the case. These considerations naturally include a number of particulars, as of time, place, persons and things, varying according to the nature of the case.²¹ Circumstances which are to be considered in alleviation of punishment are : (1) the minority of the offender; (2) the old age of the offender; (3) the condition of the offender, e.g., wife, apprentice; (4) the order of a superior military officer; (5) provocation; (6) when offence committed under a combination of circumstances and the influence of motives which are not likely to recur either with respect to the offender or to any other; (7) the state of health and the sex of the delinquent.²² Bentham mentions the following circumstances in mitigation of punishment which should be inflicted : (1) absence of bad intention; (2) provocation; (3) self-preservation; (4) preservation of some near friend; (5) transgression of the limit of self-defence; (6) submission to the menaces; (7) submission to authority; (8) drunkenness; (9) childhood.

The effect of imposing fine on a youthful offender is to give the parent the option of keeping the child out of jail by a moderate payment. Such a fine would probably have to be paid by the parent; but parents may reasonably be expected to restrain the activities of their children when those activities conflict with the law.²³

The maximum imprisonment that can be awarded for an offence is fourteen years (s. 55). The lowest term actually named for a given offence is twenty-four hours (s. 510), but the minimum is unlimited.

The minimum term of imprisonment, however, is fixed in the following two cases :—

(1) If, at the time of committing robbery or dacoity, the offender uses any deadly weapon, or causes grievous hurt to any person, he shall be punished with imprisonment of not less than seven years (s. 397).

(2) If, at the time of attempting to commit robbery or dacoity, the offender is armed with any deadly weapon, he shall be punished with imprisonment of not less than seven years (s. 398).

An offender shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment in the cases of—

(1) Giving or fabricating false evidence with intent to procure conviction of an offence which is capital by the Code, or by the law of England (s. 194).

(2) Unlawful return from transportation (s. 226).

(3) House-trespass in order to the commission of an offence punishable with death (s. 449).

The following offences are punishable with simple imprisonment only :—

(1) Public servant unlawfully engaging in trade; or unlawfully buying or bidding for property (ss. 168, 169).

(2) A person absconding to avoid service of summons or other proceeding, from a public servant, or preventing service of summons or other proceeding, preventing publication thereof; or not attending in obedience to an order from a public servant (ss. 172, 173, 174).

(3) Intentional omission to produce a document to a public servant by a person legally bound to produce such document; or intentional omission to give notice or information to a public servant by a person legally bound to give; or intentional omission to assist public servant when bound by law to give assistance (ss. 175, 176, 187).

(4) Refusing oath when duly required to take by a public servant; or refusing to answer a public servant authorized to question; or refusing to sign any statement made by a person himself before a public servant (ss. 178, 179, 180).

(5) Disobedience to an order duly promulgated by a public servant (s. 188).

(6) Escape from confinement negligently suffered by a public servant; or negligent omission to apprehend, or negligent sufferance of escape, on the part of a public servant in cases not otherwise provided for (ss. 223, 225A).

(7) Intentional insult or interruption to a public servant sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding (s. 228).

(8) Continuance of nuisance after injunction to discontinue (s. 291).

(9) Wrongful restraint (s. 341).

(10) Defamation; printing or selling defamatory matter known to be so (ss. 500, 501, 502).

(11) Uttering any word, or making any sound or gesture, with an intention to insult the modesty of a woman (s. 509).

(12) Misconduct in a public place by a drunken person (s. 510).

Imprisonment till rising of the Court.—A sentence of imprisonment till the rising of the Court is a sentence which is in accordance with law. A direction by the Court that a person shall be confined in the Court premises till the Court rises constitutes imprisonment within the meaning of the Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code. The Court has power to pass such a sentence where the facts of a case warrant it, but it should only be imposed in very exceptional cases²⁴

5. Forfeiture.—Absolute forfeiture of property was a punishment inflicted on persons guilty of high political offences. It could also be inflicted on persons guilty of offences punishable with death. It has been abolished by Act XVI of 1921.

In England this punishment is abolished by 33 & 34 Vic., c. 23, s. 1. In America too it is done away with.

Forfeiture of specific property is still retained by a punishment in the following cases :—

(1) Whoever commits, or prepares to commit, depredation on the territories of any power at peace with the King, shall be liable, in addition to other punishments, to forfeiture of any property used, or intended to be used, in depredation, or acquired thereby (s. 126).

(2) Whoever knowingly receives property taken as above mentioned or in waging war against any Asiatic power at peace with the King, shall be liable to forfeit such property (s. 127).

(3) A public servant, who improperly purchases property, which, by virtue of his office, he is legally prohibited from purchasing, forfeits such property (s. 169).

6. Fine.—“Death, imprisonment, transportation, banishment, solitude compelled labour, are not, indeed, equally disagreeable to all men. But they are so disagreeable to all men that the legislature, in assigning these punishments to offences, may safely neglect the differences produced by temper and situation. With fine, the case is different. In imposing a fine, it is always necessary to have as much regard to the pecuniary circumstances of the offender as to the character and magnitude of the offence. The mulct which is ruinous to a labourer is easily borne by a tradesman, and is absolutely unfelt by a rich zemindar. . . . Punishment of fine is a peculiarly appropriate punishment for all offences to which men are prompted by cupidity; for it is a punishment which operates directly on the very feeling which impels men to such offences. A man who has been guilty of . . . forging a bill of exchange, for example, of keeping a receptacle for stolen goods, or of extensive embezzlement, ought . . . to be so fined as to reduce him to poverty."²⁵

The Code sanctions either a term of imprisonment or a fine or both, and it is left to the discretion of the Court whether to inflict a sentence of imprisonment or a fine or both. It is only in very exceptional circumstances that it is suitable and appropriate to inflict a fine as well as a substantial term of imprisonment. It is only suitable in cases where the Court thinks that the justice of the case will be met by inflicting a substantial fine, but at the same time thinks that a short term of imprisonment in addition will serve as a salutary lesson to the accused, or in cases where it is desired to compensate the complainant or in cases where the accused has profited financially by his misdeeds.¹ The Court should exercise a careful discretion in the matter of superimposing fines upon long substantive terms of imprisonment. It is not proper, in the case of a poor peasant, to add to a very long term of substantive imprisonment a fine which there is no reasonable prospect of the accused person being able to pay and for default in payment of which he will have to undergo a yet further term of imprisonment; and especially so, in cases where the term of imprisonment to be undergone in default will bring the aggregate sentence of imprisonment to more than the maximum term of imprisonment sanctioned by the section under which he is convicted.² A Magistrate is not justified in inflicting heavy fines on poor persons, on the mere supposition that they are backed up by influential persons.³

Fine is the only punishment in the following cases :—

(1) Unlimited—

- (a) The person for whose benefit a riot has been committed, not having duly endeavoured to prevent it (s. 155).
- (b) The agent or manager of such person under like circumstances (s. 156).
- (c) False statement in connection with an election (s. 171G).

(2) Limited to Rs. 1,000—

- (a) The owner or occupier of land on which a riot or unlawful assembly is held, and any person having or claiming any interest in such land, and not using all lawful means to prevent such riot or unlawful assembly, is punishable with fine not exceeding Rs. 1,000 (s. 154).
- (b) Whoever publishes any proposal to pay any sum or to deliver any goods, or to do or forbear doing anything for the benefit of any person, or any event or contingency relative or applicable to the drawing of any ticket, lot, number, or figure, in any such lottery, shall be punished with fine not exceeding Rs. 1,000 (s. 294A).

(3) Limited to Rs. 500—

- (a) A person in charge of a merchant vessel, negligently allowing a deserter from the Army, Navy or Air Force to obtain concealment in such vessel, is liable to a fine not exceeding Rs. 500 (s. 137).
- (b) Voluntarily vitiating the atmosphere so as to render it noxious to the public health, is punishable with a fine of Rs. 500 (s. 278).
- (c) Illegal payment in connection with an election (s. 171H).
- (d) Failure to keep election accounts (s. 171-I).

(4) Limited to Rs. 200—

- (a) Offences relating to fictitious stamps (s. 263A).
- (b) Obstructing a public way or line of navigation, is punishable with fine not exceeding Rs. 200 (s. 283).
- (c) Committing of a public nuisance, not otherwise punishable, is punishable with fine not exceeding Rs. 200 (s. 290).

7. Whipping.—This form of punishment is added by the Whipping Act⁵ under which offenders are liable to whipping—

- (a) As an alternative punishment when offences under ss. 378, 380, 382, 443, 444, 445 and 446 of the Penal Code are committed.
- (b) As an alternative or additional punishment when offences under ss. 375, 377, 390 and 391 of the Penal Code are committed.
- (c) When they are juvenile offenders and commit certain offences specified in s. 5 of the Whipping Act.

It should be employed at the discretion of the Judge in all cases in which the offence involves cruelty in the way of inflicting pain, or in which the offender's motive is lust. The man who cruelly inflicts pain on another should be made to feel what it is like. The man who gratifies his own passions at the expense of a cruel and humiliating insult inflicted on another should be himself shamefully and painfully humiliated.

Whipping should be inflicted in cases where there is a certain amount of aggravation in the commission of the offence.⁶

Concurrent sentences of whipping on conviction for two offences at one trial are illegal.⁷ Section 35, Criminal Procedure Code, authorises the passing of concurrent sentences of imprisonment only.

In France, Germany, and the United States corporal punishment has been abolished.

8. Detention in Reformatories.—Juvenile offenders sentenced to transportation or imprisonment may be detained in a Reformatory School for a period of three to seven years.⁸ See the Madras Borstal Schools Act, Mad. Act V of 1926, the Bombay Borstal Schools Act, Bom. Act XVIII of 1929, the Central Provinces Borstal Schools Act, C. P. Act IX of 1928.

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—Death.—When any person is sentenced to death, the sentence shall direct that he be hanged by the neck till he is dead.⁹ When a sentence of death passed by a Court of Session is submitted to the High Court for confirmation, such Court of Session shall, on receiving the order of confirmation or other order of the High Court thereon, cause such order to be carried into effect by issuing a warrant or taking such other steps as may be necessary.¹⁰ If a woman sentenced to death is found to be pregnant, the High Court shall order the execution of the sentence to be postponed, and may, if it thinks fit, commute the sentence to transportation for life.¹¹

Transportation.—No sentence of transportation shall specify the place to which the person sentenced is to be transported.¹² The Governor-General in Council is empowered to fix places in British India to which persons sentenced to transportation may be sent. It is the duty of the local Government to make arrangements for the removal of such person.¹³

Imprisonment.—A sentence of imprisonment cannot be suspended to take effect at a future period, but must commence from the time that the sentence is passed. Where a Deputy Magistrate postponed the execution of a sentence of imprisonment for a stated period at the request of the accused, to allow him to appeal, it was held that the sentence was bad in law and could not be carried into execution.¹⁴

A Judge has no jurisdiction after the discharge of the jury and in the absence of the accused to alter the sentence recorded at the trial, even if the term of imprisonment is not effectively altered though distributed among the counts so as to avoid exceeding the maximum punishment on some of them.¹⁵

Bombay Circulars.—(1) The Honourable the Chief Justice and Judges have had under consideration the question of the proper treatment of young or adolescent criminals, and they desire to impress upon all Magistrates the necessity of making themselves fully acquainted with the powers which they possess by law to deal suitably with such cases.

(2) The relevant legislation is contained in section 562 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Reformatory Schools Act, 1897, the Whipping Act, 1909, and in places where it has been extended, the Bombay Children Act, 1924. As to section 562, no definite limit of age is imposed. The Reformatory Schools Act is applicable in the case of male offenders under fifteen years of age, or, in the special case of section 31, to offenders of either sex under fifteen years of age. But that limit of age has been raised to sixteen years in places to which the Bombay Children Act has been applied. Those places are at present the City of Bombay and the Municipal Borough of Lonavla. The Bombay Children Act applies to children under fourteen years of age or young persons between the ages of fourteen and sixteen. The Whipping Act deals both with adult male offenders and with male offenders under sixteen years of age.

(3) In the majority of these cases short sentences of imprisonment are undesirable and should not be inflicted unless special reasons exist for doing so. Magistrates should therefore consider carefully whether the case falls within the provisions of section 562 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, or section 31 of the Reformatory Schools Act, and if so, whether the procedure laid down by those sections is not appropriate. If the Magistrate feels that the case cannot properly be dealt with under those sections and that a sentence of fine is inappropriate, he should then consider whether section 2 of the Whipping Act, 1909, or, in the case of juvenile offenders, that section or section 5 does not furnish a suitable penalty, or whether it may not be better to have recourse to sections 8 and 9 of the Reformatory Schools Act. In places where the Bombay Children Act, 1924, is in force, and no Children's Court has been constituted, the provisions of that Act should also be remembered.¹⁶

When any person serving in the Military Department is convicted in a Criminal Court, such Court shall inform the Officer Commanding the Regiment or Corps to which the convict belongs.¹⁷

Whenever an Indian Military Pensioner is convicted and sentenced to a term of imprisonment by a Criminal Court, a copy of the judgment in the case should in future be forwarded without delay to the Deputy Controller of Military Accounts (Pensions), Lahore. The copy should be supplied free of charge and the place from where the pensioner last drew his pension should be stated in the forwarding letter.¹⁸

When a reservist of the Indian Army is sentenced by a Criminal Court to transportation or imprisonment for any term exceeding three months, the facts of the case should be reported, without delay, by such Court to the Officer Commanding the appropriate Reserve Centre (vide Bom. Gov. Gaz. for 1932, Part I, p. 120).¹⁹

All Criminal Courts shall in future supply to the Defence Department (Army Branch) of the Government of India copies of judgments in all cases in which Commissioned Officers and British other ranks are tried by them for criminal offences. (Vide Bom. Gov. Gaz. for 1940, Part IV-C, p. 1261).²⁰

Burma Circular.—Imprisonment for a fraction of a day should not be awarded unless it is the only period that can legally be imposed. There is, however, no objection to a sentence of imprisonment until the rising of the Court, where only a nominal sentence is called for.²² While it is not desired to impinge in any way upon the discretionary powers possessed by Magistrates in sentencing offenders, it is, however, necessary to emphasise the evils arising from sentencing offenders to short terms of imprisonment of three months or less. Particularly in the case of the labouring classes, the deterrent effect of such sentences is small, as vaccination, inoculation, etc., take up three weeks and the convict has then only a short time to serve and cannot be put to any work demanding continuity of effort. As a rule he is employed in menial tasks connected with the domestic economy of the Jail, and generally has an easy time. On the other hand, the moral effect of prison life is generally bad, while the associations are degrading, and the loss of character and self-respect involved in even the shortest term of imprisonment often tends to create a criminal. It is recognised that in some cases no other form of punishment than a short term of imprisonment can be imposed, and a short sentence of imprisonment should not be avoided by passing a sentence for a longer term than the circumstances of the case really require. But in every case the Magistrate, before passing a sentence of imprisonment for a term of three months or less, should first consider whether some other order such as the imposing of a fine or a sentence of whipping, release on probation under section 562, Criminal Procedure Code, or the granting of time under section 388, in which to realise the amount of fine imposed, may not suitably be passed. A sentence of a short term of imprisonment should not be passed until all other possible alternatives have been considered. Second and third class Magistrates should freely make use of the provisions of section 349, Criminal Procedure Code, by forwarding the accused to the District or Sub-divisional Magistrate to receive a punishment different in kind from or more severe than that which can be imposed by them.²³

To assist the Courts in deciding when sentences of simple imprisonment may fitly be passed the following orders of the Government of India are reproduced :—

“It has been brought to notice that in one province at least it is a common practice for the Courts to pass a sentence of simple imprisonment, not because a minor degree of moral turpitude is involved in the crime committed, but in view of the prisoner's presumed unfitness for labour. The Government of India believe that it is not the practice for the Courts to take into consideration any question of the physical fitness of a convict to labour. It is for the jail authorities to ascertain what labour is appropriate to a prisoner's strength and to put him to that only; the Courts have merely to consider the amount and nature of the imprisonment appropriate to the offence, and the character and status of the offender, and they would realize that by selecting simple instead of rigorous imprisonment they make a very essential difference in the way in which a prisoner will be treated on his admission to jail”.²⁴

Fine.—A sentence of fine where more prisoners than one are punished by fine must define by a specific sum the individual liability of each prisoner.²⁵

Ordinarily a criminal appeal abates on the death of the appellant. Section 431, Criminal Procedure Code, has, however, been amended so as to provide that this rule will not apply when the appeal is from a sentence of fine. The fines imposed on the deceased may, if the convictions are allowed to stand, be realised from his legal representatives. It is undesirable that this should be so, when there is no more reason to maintain his convictions.¹

Whipping.—As to the mode of executing this sentence, see ss. 390-396 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

54. In every case in which sentence of death shall have been passed, the Central Government or the Provincial Government of the Province within which the offender shall have been sentenced may, without the consent of the offender, commute the punishment for any other punishment provided by this Code.

COMMENT.

See the observations of the authors of the Code set out under the next section. This section empowers the Government to commute the sentence of death "for any other punishment provided by this Code". It was once thought that s. 402 of the Criminal Procedure Code limited this power as it provided that the Central Government or Provincial Government may, without the consent of the person sentenced, commute any one of the following sentences for any other mentioned after it:—death, transportation, penal servitude, rigorous imprisonment for a term not exceeding that to which he might have been sentenced, simple imprisonment for a like term, fine. But by the Criminal Procedure Code Amending Act XVIII of 1923, a sub-section has been added to s. 402—" (2) Nothing in this section shall affect the provision of section 54 or 55 of the Indian Penal Code." This amendment shows that the power given by this section is not restricted by s. 402 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Postponement of capital sentence on pregnant woman.—Section 382 of the Criminal Procedure Code says: "If a woman sentenced to death is found to be pregnant, the High Court shall order the execution of the sentence to be postponed, and may, if it thinks fit, commute the sentence to transportation for life".

Amendment.—The words "the Central Government or the Provincial Government of the Province" were substituted for the words "the Government of India or the Government of the place" by the Government of India (Adaption of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. In Burma the word "Governor" was substituted for the words "Government of India or the Government of the place within which the offender shall have been sentenced", by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

55. In every case in which sentence of transportation for life shall have been passed, the Provincial Government of the Province within which the offender shall have been sentenced may, without the consent of the offender, commute the punishment for imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding fourteen years.

COMMENT.

Under this section the Provincial Government has power to commute the sentence of transportation for life to punishment for imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding fourteen years without the consent of the prisoner. But where the sentence has not been commuted under this section the prisoner could be lawfully kept for twenty years in one of the jails in India appointed for transportation of prisoners and be dealt with in the same manner as a prisoner sentenced to rigorous imprisonment.²

1. 'Without the consent of the offender'.—The authors of the Code say: "It is evidently fit that the Government should be empowered to commute the sentence of death for any other punishment provided by the Code. It seems to us also very desirable that the Government should have the power of commuting perpetual transportation for perpetual imprisonment. Many circumstances of which the executive authorities ought to be accurately informed, but which must often be unknown to the ablest judge, may, at particular times, render it highly inconvenient to carry a sentence of transportation into effect. The state of those remote provinces of the empire in which convict settlements are established, and the way in which the interest of those provinces may be affected by any addition to the convict population, are matters which lie together out of the cognizance of the tribunals by which those sentences are passed, and which the Government only is competent to decide.”³

Amendment.—The words “the Provincial Government of the Province” were substituted for the words “the Government of India or the Government of the place” by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. In Burma the word “Governor” was substituted for the words “Government of India or the Government of the place within which the offender shall have been sentenced” by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—See ss. 401 and 402 of the Criminal Procedure Code which provide for suspensions, remissions, and commutations of sentences.

A distinction is to be observed between the powers conferred by s. 55 of the Penal Code and those conferred by s. 401 of the Criminal Procedure Code. If the accused, after he is transported for life, has his punishment commuted under s. 55 of the Code to imprisonment for fourteen years, he cannot, upon his release, be regarded thereafter as “being under sentence of transportation for life.” But where the sentence of transportation has been remitted under s. 401 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the accused must be regarded as still “being under sentence of transportation for life” after his release from jail.⁴

Madras Rule.—Courts of Sessions sentencing an offender who is not less than 16 and not more than 21 years of age to transportation for life shall consider whether a recommendation should be made to the Provincial Government that the offender be detained in a Borstal School.⁵

55A. Nothing in section fifty-four or section fifty-five shall derogate from the right of His Majesty, or of the Governor-General if any such right is delegated to him by His Majesty, to grant pardons, reprieves, respite or remissions of punishment.

Saving for Royal prerogative.

56. Whenever any person being an European¹ or American is convicted of an offence punishable under this Code with transportation, the Court shall sentence the offender to penal servitude instead of transportation according to the provisions of Act XXIV of 1855 :

Sentence of Europeans and Americans to penal servitude.

Provided that, where an European or American offender would, but for such Act, be liable to be sentenced or ordered to be transported for a term exceeding ten years, but not for life, he shall be liable to be sentenced or ordered to be kept in penal servitude for such term exceeding six years as to the Court seems fit, but not for life.

Proviso as to sentence for term exceeding ten years, but not for life.

COMMENT.

The punishment of penal servitude is only applicable to Europeans and Americans.⁶

1. ‘European’.—This word, as used in Act XXIV of 1855, shall be understood to include any person usually designated an European British subject (s. 15). ‘European British subject’ means, (i) any subject of His Majesty of European descent in the male line born, naturalized or domiciled in the British Islands or any colony, or (ii) any subject of His Majesty who is the child or grand-child of any such person by legitimate descent.⁷

Proviso.—This was added by Act XXVII of 1870, s. 3.

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—For the special procedure for the trial of European British subjects, Europeans or Americans, see the Code of Criminal Procedure, Ch. XXXIII, s. 443, et seq.

To make out a plea to the jurisdiction on the ground that the accused is a British-born subject, it is necessary to prove not only legitimate descent but also nationality. Hearsay evidence is not admissible to prove nationality.⁸

Fractions of terms of punishment.

57. In calculating fractions of terms of punishment, transportation for life shall be reckoned as equivalent to transportation for twenty years.

COMMENT.

For calculating fractions of terms of punishments this section provides that transportation for life shall be reckoned as equivalent to transportation for twenty years. But it nowhere provides that for other purposes transportation for life is to be treated as transportation for only twenty years. The sentencing Court must regard a sentence of transportation for life as a sentence for transportation for the whole of the remaining period of the convicted person's natural life. As a matter of fact, Government treats such a sentence as a sentence of transportation for a certain number of years.⁹

The Privy Council have held that a life sentence of transportation must not in all cases be treated as one of not more than twenty years, or that a convict was necessarily entitled to remission.¹⁰

58. In every case in which a sentence of transportation is passed, the offender, until he is transported, shall be dealt with in the same manner as if sentenced to rigorous imprisonment, and shall be held to have been undergoing his sentence of transportation during the term of his imprisonment.

Offender sentenced to transportation how dealt with until transported.

59. In every case in which an offender is punishable with imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards¹, it shall be competent to the Court which sentences² such offender, instead of awarding sentence of imprisonment,³ to sentence the offender to transportation for a term not less than seven years, and not exceeding the term for which by this Code such offender is liable to imprisonment⁴.

Transportation instead of imprisonment.

COMMENT.

Object.—Under the Penal Code as originally prepared, the power of passing sentence of transportation instead of imprisonment was vested in the Government, and not in the Courts. "At the time when the Penal Code was prepared by the Indian Law Commissioners, it was a rule of the Court of Directors of the East India Company that no native should be sentenced to transportation for a period less than for life, it being the opinion at that time that a native of India, if once transported, should never be allowed to return to this country. The Indian Penal Code, as prepared by the Law Commissioners, did not provide transportation as punishment for any period short of life, and it did not give power to the Government to commute a sentence of imprisonment for seven years into transportation, except in cases where the prisoner was not of Asiatic blood and of Asiatic birth. But, when the Penal Code came to be altered, a different rule was thought necessary. It was thought reasonable that natives of India as well as Europeans and others should be sentenced to transportation for periods less than for life, and that the reason for not allowing a native, who had once been transported, to return to India, no longer held good, and, therefore, as the Penal Code as prepared by the Indian Law Commissioners did not provide transportation as a punishment for any less period than for life, it was thought advisable, when the Code was altered, to enact" this section as a general clause.¹¹

Though this section was introduced when the Bill was before the Council, yet no alteration appears to have been made in the language of the several sections which prescribed transportation as a punishment. Thus, in the majority of instances, the words used are:—"shall be punished with transportation for life or with imprisonment which may extend, etc." While the Court has an option in determining the duration of the term of imprisonment, it has no option in determining the duration of the term of transportation.¹² In no section of the Code which prescribes transportation as a punishment, with the exception of this section and ss. 121A and 124A, is the language used such as to leave the Court any option regarding the duration of the term.

Principle.—This section only enacts a general rule to the effect that in the case of offences for which no transportation is specially mentioned as a punishment and which are punishable with imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards, it is competent to the Judge to substitute a sentence of transportation as a substantive sentence for that of imprisonment.¹³ The term of transportation under it cannot exceed the term of imprisonment provided by the section under which a conviction is had.¹⁴ It cannot be less than seven years.

Scope.—This section "applies exclusively to cases in which the offender may legally be sentenced by the Court trying him to imprisonment for seven years."¹⁵ It necessarily gives power to a Court which could sentence a prisoner to seven years' imprisonment to sentence him to seven years' transportation in lieu of it: but it does not intend to give this power to a Court, which could not sentence to imprisonment for more than two years to transport for seven.¹⁶ The section, no doubt, goes out of the ordinary course adopted in other parts of the Code and, instead of defining the punishment, gives a certain power to the Court, which passes the sentence, to award a different kind of punishment from that specified in the Code.¹⁷

1. 'In every case in which an offender is punishable with imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards'.—The punishment awarded for one offence alone must be imprisonment for seven years or upwards. It cannot be made up by adding two sentences together and then commuting the amalgamated period to transportation.¹⁸ A general sentence of transportation for two or more offences, when only one of the punishments awarded is seven years' imprisonment, is illegal.¹⁹

2. 'It shall be competent to the Court which sentences'.—That is, it shall be competent to the Court, which has power to sentence the prisoner to imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards, to sentence him to transportation instead of imprisonment. If the Court passing sentence has jurisdiction to sentence to imprisonment for seven years, then it has also jurisdiction, under this section, to pass a sentence of transportation for seven years.²⁰

3. 'Instead of awarding sentence of imprisonment'.—The proper procedure is to pass a sentence of imprisonment for the term fixed by law for the particular offence and then, under this section, direct that the prisoner be transported for that period.²¹ The Court may, in passing sentence for the offence, commute the imprisonment to transportation; but it cannot commute the sentence after the sentence of imprisonment has been passed.²²

4. 'Transportation for a term not less than seven years, and not exceeding...imprisonment'.—A transportation awarded under this section cannot exceed the imprisonment for which the prisoner might have been sentenced, even though it would have been open to the Court to award a longer period of transportation under the section appropriate to the crime. Thus, where the law gives the alternative punishments of death, transportation for life, and rigorous imprisonment extending to ten years, and the Court does not inflict the extreme penalty of transportation for life, it cannot award more than ten years' transportation.²³ When an offence is punishable with transportation for life or imprisonment for a term of ten years, if a sentence of transportation for a term less than life is awarded, such term cannot exceed the term of imprisonment, namely; ten years. Where, therefore, the accused, on conviction for an offence under s. 395, was sentenced to transportation for fifteen years, the High Court reduced the sentence to transportation for a term of ten years, that being the period of imprisonment provided for the offence.²⁴ No sentence of transportation for a shorter period than seven years can be passed on any charge.²⁵ Where the accused was convicted on separate charges of giving false evidence in a judicial proceeding under s. 193 and of forgery under s. 467, and sentenced to seven years' transportation for the first offence, and a further period of transportation for three years for the second offence, the second conviction was quashed as illegal.¹

Where the accused was convicted of an attempt to commit rape and sentenced, under this section, to seven years' transportation, the sentence was set aside on the ground that, as rape was only punishable with ten years' imprisonment, under s. 511 only five years' imprisonment could be awarded for an attempt to commit such an offence. At the same time it was held that as rape was punishable with transportation for life—transportation for twenty years (s. 57)—the sentence of seven years' transportation being less than one-half of twenty years would have been legal if passed independently of this section.²

Sentence under special or local law.—The section does not apply to sentences under a special or local law and transportation cannot, therefore, be ordered in the case of offences punishable under such law.³

Transportation cannot be substituted for imprisonment in default of fine.—This section does not authorise the substitution of transportation for the imprisonment to which a Court can sentence an offender in default of payment of fine.⁴

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—In commuting a sentence of imprisonment to one of transportation, s. 35, Criminal Procedure Code, must be read together with the sections of the Penal Code, which prescribe the limits of punishment for different offences.⁵

Lahore Rule.—Section 59 of the Indian Penal Code empowers Courts to award transportation instead of imprisonment in cases in which offenders are punishable with imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards, and Sessions Judges and Magistrates of districts, exercising enhanced powers, are informed that, in order to bring this section into operation, the punishment awarded for one offence alone must be seven years or upwards. The term of seven years cannot be made up by adding two sentences together and then commuting the amalgamated period of imprisonment to one of transportation. The correct mode of proceeding is to sentence the offender to transportation, mentioning at the same time that, under s. 59 of the Indian Penal Code, such transportation is awarded instead of imprisonment.

2. The restriction placed on the transportation of term convicts by Government of India Resolution No. 2032, dated December 28, 1868, on which the Courts were instructed to refrain from exercising the power vested in them by s. 59 of the Indian Penal Code of substituting transportation for imprisonment, has since been withdrawn by the Government of India, except in the case of females.

3. No sentence of transportation should specify the place to which the person sentenced is to be transported. When any Court passes a sentence of transportation for a term it should at the same time express an opinion, on which the Provincial Government could act under the powers conferred by s. 55 of the Indian Penal Code, as to the amount of imprisonment suitable in lieu of the sentence of transportation, should it be found impracticable for the convict to be transported beyond seas. Such opinion should be expressed by the Court in a separate note which should be forwarded confidentially by the Court to the Inspector-General of Prisons, Punjab, immediately after the judgment has been pronounced. If the convict is not eligible for transportation under paragraph 721 of the Jail Manual or if the Committee referred to in paragraph 726 of the Manual is unable to certify him as fit for transportation the Inspector-General of Prisons will report the case to the Provincial Government for orders under s. 55 of the Indian Penal Code or under s. 402 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, as the case may be, and will attach the relevant note. Particular care should be taken that the separate note relating to a convict does not form part of the record of the case, e.g. the note should not be recorded in continuation of the judgment.⁶

Bengal Rule.—The correct mode of proceeding is to sentence the offender to transportation, mentioning at the same time that, under s. 59 of the Indian Penal Code, such transportation is awarded instead of imprisonment, simple or rigorous, as the case may be.⁷

The Central Province Circular.—When term-transportation is allowed, Sessions Judges and Magistrates with special powers should pass term-sentences of transportation in cases in which [such sentence may legally and suitably be passed. The correct procedure is to sentence the offender to transportation under the section under which the offence is punishable read with s. 59 of the Indian Penal Code.⁸

Burma Circular.—(1) Sentences of transportation are not carried out in practice, and prisoners are not deported to the Andamans unless they volunteer to go as colonists or in a clerical or menial capacity. Consequently Sessions Judges and Magistrates exercising Special Powers should not exercise the option which they possess under section 59 of the Indian Penal Code except in very serious cases, such as offences under sections 121-180 of the Code, and a sentence of transportation should not ordinarily be passed unless it is essential under the Code, e.g. in the case of life sentences.

(2) Under section 59 of the Indian Penal Code, a sentence of imprisonment is not commuted to one of transportation. The correct procedure is to sentence the offender to transportation under the section under which the offence is punishable read with section 59 of the Indian Penal Code.⁹

Mode of sentencing.—The sentence should run thus:—"The Court directs, under the provisions of section—and s. 59 of the Indian Penal Code, that the said—be" (sentence).

60. In every case in which an offender is punishable with imprisonment which may be of either description, it shall be competent to the Court which sentences such offender to direct in the sentence that such imprisonment shall be wholly rigorous, or that such imprisonment shall be wholly simple, or that any part of such imprisonment shall be rigorous and the rest simple.

Sentence may be (in certain cases of imprisonment) wholly or partly rigorous or simple.

COMMENT.

Where an offence is punishable with imprisonment, a sentence of imprisonment must be awarded. A sentence of imprisonment for the period passed in lock-up is illegal, but a sentence of imprisonment until the rising of the Court is good in, and fulfils the requirement of, the law.¹⁰

As to the application of ss. 60 and 63-74 to sentences passed in the Punjab Frontier District, in the North-West Frontier Province, or in Baluchistan, see the Frontier Crimes Regulation.¹¹

As to the application of ss. 60, 63, 64, 65, 68 and 74 to the Sindh Frontier, see the Sindh Frontier Regulation.¹²

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—Lahore Rule.—The Indian Penal Code provides for imprisonment of two kinds, viz., simple and rigorous, and the Court must choose one or the other form in view of all the circumstances. In certain Local and Special Acts, it will be found that the Legislature has not specified the kind of imprisonment which may be awarded. Under section 3 (26) of the General Clauses Act, 1897, such imprisonment may be simple or rigorous. In the case of many offences under the Indian Penal Code and other Acts, it is provided that the offender shall be punished with imprisonment up to a certain term and shall also be liable to fine. In such cases the offender must be sentenced to some period of imprisonment (however small), but it is not obligatory to impose fine in addition, as supposed by some Magistrates.

2. Simple imprisonment is suitable where a fine will not suffice and a very short term of imprisonment has to be imposed. This ensures casual offenders being kept apart from the contamination of hardened criminals.

3. The Indian Penal Code provides for "solitary confinement" being awarded up to a certain limit (vide section 73). This form of punishment is appropriate in the case of the more heinous class of offences. It should be borne in mind, however, that solitary confinement can be awarded in the case of offences under the Indian Penal Code only and not in the case of offences under Special or Local Acts.¹³

Madras Rule.—The Government consider the awarding of short-term imprisonments as undesirable and Magistrates, before passing such sentences, should consider whether imprisonments till the rising of the Court allowed by law could not appropriately be passed instead, or the provisions of s. 562, Criminal Procedure Code, applied in favour of accused persons.¹⁴

62. [Forfeiture of property, in respect of offenders punishable with death, transportation or imprisonment.] Repealed by s. 4 of Act XVI of 1921.

63. Where no sum is expressed to which a fine may extend, the amount of fine to which the offender is liable is unlimited, but shall not be excessive.

COMMENT.

In criminal cases the measure of punishment must be carefully regulated and in the imposition of a fine due proportion must be preserved with regard to the nature of the offence and the means of the offender.¹⁵ The description of fine which it was the object of this section to prohibit, was a fine which it would be impossible or very difficult for the accused person to pay, or wholly disproportioned to the character of the offence.¹⁶

On this point the authors of the Code observe: "Death, imprisonment, transportation, banishment, solitude, compelled labour, are not, indeed, equally disagreeable to all men. But they are so disagreeable to all men that the legislature, in assigning these punishments to offences, may safely neglect the differences produced by temper and situation. With fine, the case is different. In imposing a fine, it is always necessary to have as much regard to the pecuniary circumstances of the offender as to the character and magnitude of the offence. The mulct which is ruinous to a labourer is easily borne by a tradesman, and is absolutely unfelt by a rich Zamindar. It is impossible to fix any limit to the amount of a fine which will not either be so high as to be ruinous to the poor, or so low as to be no object of terror to the rich. There are many millions in India who would be utterly unable to pay a fine of fifty rupees; there are hundreds of thousands from whom such a fine might be levied, but whom it would reduce to extreme distress; there are thousands to whom it would give very little uneasiness; there are hundreds to whom it would be a matter of perfect indifference, and who would not cross a room to avoid it. The number of the poor in every country exceeds in a very great ratio the number of the rich. The number of poor criminals exceeds the number of rich criminals in a still greater ratio. And to the poor criminal it is a matter of absolute indifference whether the fine to which he is liable be limited or not, unless it be so limited as to render it quite inefficient as a mode of punishing the rich. To a man who has no capital, who has laid by nothing, whose monthly wages are just sufficient to provide himself and his family with their monthly rice, it matters not whether the fine for assault be left to be settled by the discretion of the Courts, or whether a hundred rupees be fixed as the maximum. There are no degrees in impossibility. He is no more able to pay a hundred rupees than to pay a lac. A just and wise judge, even if intrusted with a boundless discretion, will not, under ordinary circumstances, sentence such an offender to a fine of a hundred rupees. And the limit of a hundred rupees would leave it quite in the power of an unjust or inconsiderate judge to inflict on such an offender all the evil which can be inflicted on him by means of fine. . . .

"It appears to us that the punishment of fine is a peculiarly appropriate punishment for all offences to which men are prompted by cupidity; for it is a punishment which operates directly on the very feeling which impels men to such offences. A man who has been guilty of great offences arising from cupidity, of forging a bill of exchange, for example, of keeping a receptacle for stolen goods, or of extensive embezzlement, ought, we conceive, to be so fined as to reduce him to poverty. That such a man should, when his imprisonment is over, return to the enjoyment of three-fourths of his property, a property which may be very large and which may have been accumulated by his offences, appears to us highly objectionable. Those persons who are most likely to commit such offences would often be less deterred by knowing that the offender had passed several years in imprisonment, than encouraged by seeing him, after his liberation, enjoying the far larger part of his wealth."¹⁷

Magisterial fines.—In a Calcutta case it has been doubted whether this section applies to fines inflicted by a Magistrate, as the power of a Magistrate to fine is, in all cases, under the Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code, limited to Rs. 1,000, and it is only the Court of Session and the High Court that can inflict fines to an unlimited extent.¹⁸

Statutory application of ss. 63-70.—The provisions of ss. 63 to 70 apply to all fines imposed under any Act, Regulation, rule or bye-law, unless the Act, Regulation, rule, or bye-law contains an express provision to the contrary.¹⁹

General Clauses Act (I of 1898), s. 28, make ss. 63-70 applicable to all fines under any local Acts. The Burma General Clauses Act (I of 1898), s. 25, and the Assam General Clauses Act (Assam Act II of 1915), s. 28, the Bihar and Orissa General Clauses Act, 1897, and the Central Provinces General Clauses Act (C. P. Act I of 1914), s. 24, contain similar provisions. These sections are also held applicable to Frontier Crimes Regulation (III of 1901), s. 61; to the Andaman and Nicobar Islands Regulation (III of 1876), s. 35; to the Arakan Hill District Laws Regulation (IX of 1874), s. 18; to the Ajmere Forest Regulation (X of 1874), s. 13.

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—Whenever a fine is imposed, the Court may issue a warrant for levy of fine as provided in the Code of Criminal Procedure.²⁰ The whole or any part of the fine recovered is to be applied (a) in defraying expenses properly incurred in the prosecution; (b) in the payment to any person of compensation for any loss or injury caused by the offence, when substantial compensation is, in the opinion of the Court, recoverable by such person in a civil Court; and (c) in compensating any bona fide purchaser of property acquired in the commission of certain offences for the loss if such property is restored to its owner.²¹

Joint offenders.—Where more persons than one are fined on conviction for a joint offence, the sentence must impose a specific fine on each accused.²²

Daily fine.—An order for payment of a daily fine is illegal as it is an adjudication in respect of an offence which has not been committed when such order is passed.²³

Amount of fine.—A fine should be fixed with due regard to the circumstances of the case in which it is imposed and the condition in life of the offender, and not with the object of extending to the utmost possible limits the term of imprisonment to be awarded by the Magistrate trying a case.²⁴

Lahore Rule.—This is the lightest form of punishment which a criminal Court can impose, but care should always be taken to see that the fine is not excessive with reference to the means of the offender. Indiscriminate imposition of fines without due regard to the capacity of the convict to pay it only results in waste of time of the Courts and the police in attempting to realise it, and harassment to the convict and his dependents. Courts are empowered to impose imprisonment in default of payment of fine, for such imprisonment can only be awarded subject to the limitations prescribed in ss. 64 to 67.²⁵

Burma Circular.—Sentences of fine should never be passed without due regard to the means of the person fined to pay the fine. Excessive fines are prohibited by law and should be carefully avoided.¹

The Central Provinces Circular.—Fines should be regulated so as to accord with the circumstances of the offender and should not under any circumstances be excessive (s. 68 of the Penal Code). Fines are sometimes imposed which are manifestly impossible of realization, while there is reason to fear that many fines which are imposed in petty cases, though realized, are paid only with difficulty. It would appear that in dealing with petty cases some Magistrates fall into a way of fixing the fines at particular amounts as a matter of course, without much thought as to how they will be felt by the particular individual on whom they are imposed. It is a first principle in inflicting this mode of punishment that it is necessary to have as much regard to the pecuniary circumstances of the offender as to the character and magnitude of the offence. Fines should never in any case be imposed which are not likely to be realized at all, and they should never be imposed in petty cases with such severity as not to be easily realizable.²

to direct by the sentence that, in default of payment of the fine, the offender shall suffer imprisonment for a certain term, which imprisonment shall be in excess of any other imprisonment to which he may have been sentenced or to which he may be liable under a commutation of a sentence.

COMMENT.

Under this section the term of imprisonment in default must not exceed one-fourth of the maximum term of imprisonment fixed for the offence, if the offence is punishable with imprisonment as well as fine. This rule applies whether imprisonment is actually awarded or not. It applies to cases where imprisonment or fine, but not both, can be awarded, no less than to cases in which both imprisonment and fine can be imposed. In cases punishable with imprisonment as well as fine, the Court may award, in default of payment of the fine, imprisonment up to the limit of its ordinary powers. For example, in a case of simple theft under s. 379, if fine only is imposed, a Magistrate of the First Class may award, in default of payment, imprisonment for nine months, a Magistrate of the Second Class, imprisonment for six months, and a Magistrate of the Third Class, imprisonment for one month.

Where a Court passes a sentence of imprisonment and fine, the period of imprisonment awarded in default of payment of the fine cannot exceed one-fourth of the period which the Court has power to impose substantively. Thus, in a case of simple theft a Magistrate of the First Class cannot award more than six months, a Magistrate of the Second Class, more than one month and a half, and a Magistrate of the Third Class, more than one week.

"The wording of (this section) . . . is not happy, but . . . the Legislature intended by it to provide for the award of imprisonment in default of payment of fine in all cases in which fine can be imposed".³

Scope.—Offences punishable with death or transportation are excluded from the operation of this section.

1. 'Offence'.—This word here means anything punishable under the Code or any special or local law.⁴ See s. 25 of the General Clauses Act (X of 1897).

2. 'Imprisonment as well as fine'.—The words 'as well as' do not mean here and, as will be seen from the concluding words of the first clause, viz., 'whether with or without imprisonment'. The words 'imprisonment as well as fine' include (a) offences punishable with imprisonment or fine in the alternative, and (b) offences punishable with imprisonment or fine, or both, cumulatively.⁵

3. 'It shall be competent'.—It is not imperative to award a term of imprisonment in default of payment of the fine.⁶ It is merely permissive.

Amendment.—The first two clauses of this section were substituted for the words "in every case in which an offender is sentenced to fine" by Act VIII of 1882, s. 2; and the words "with imprisonment or fine, or" in the second clause were inserted by Act X of 1886, s. 21(2).

PRACTICE.

Award of imprisonment in default of payment of fine.—The Nagpur High Court has held that section 22 of the Cattle Trespass Act (I of 1871) does not empower a Magistrate to pass a sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of compensation.⁷

only an alternative sentence of imprisonment or fine is allowed, a sentence of fine cannot be passed.⁸

Imprisonment to be in proportion to fine.—The sentence in default of payment of fine should bear a reasonable proportion to the amount of the fine, regard being had to the circumstances of the convicted person.⁹

Sentence of imprisonment in default of fine not to run concurrently with other sentence of imprisonment.—Any sentence of imprisonment in default of fine has to be in excess of, and not concurrent with, any other sentence of imprisonment to which the accused may have been sentenced.¹⁰ Where a Court imposes two sentences of imprisonment on an accused person and orders him to pay fine on each of the two counts with imprisonment in default of payment of fine, it may order the substantive terms of imprisonment to run concurrently, but the terms of imprisonment inflicted in default of payment of fine must run consecutively.¹¹

65. The term for which the Court directs the offender to be imprisoned in default of payment of a fine shall not exceed one-fourth of the term of imprisonment which is the maximum fixed for the offence,¹ if the offence be punishable with imprisonment as well as fine.²

Limit to imprisonment for non-payment of fine, when imprisonment and fine awardable.

COMMENT.

The authors of the Code observe: "The next question which it became our duty to consider was this: when a fine has been imposed, what measures shall be adopted in default of payment? And here two modes of proceeding, with both of which we were familiar, naturally occurred to us. The offender may be imprisoned till the fine is paid, or he may be imprisoned for a certain term, such imprisonment being considered as standing in place of the fine. In the former case, the imprisonment is used in order to compel him to part with his money; in the latter case, the imprisonment is a punishment substituted for another punishment. Both modes of proceeding appear to us to be open to strong objections. To keep an offender in imprisonment till his fine is paid is, if the fine be beyond his means, to keep him in imprisonment all his life; and it is impossible for the best judge to be certain that he may not sometimes impose a fine which shall be beyond the means of an offender. Nothing could make such a system tolerable except the constant interference of some authority empowered to remit sentences; and such constant interference we should consider as in itself an evil. On the other hand, to sentence an offender to fine and to a certain fixed term of imprisonment in default of payment, and then to leave it to himself to determine whether he will part with his money or lie in gaol, appears to us to be a very objectionable course. The high authority of Mr. Livingston is here against us. He allows the criminal, if sentenced to a fine exceeding one-fourth of his property, to compel the judge to commute the excess for imprisonment at the rate of one day of imprisonment for every two dollars of fine, and he adds, that such imprisonment must in no case exceed ninety days. We regret that we cannot agree with him; the object of the penal law is to deter from offences, and this can only be done by means of inflictions disagreeable to offenders. The law ought not to inflict punishments unnecessarily severe; but it ought not, on the other hand, to call the offender into council with his judges, and to allow him an option between two punishments. In general, the circumstance that he prefers one punishment raises a strong presumption that he ought to suffer the other. The circumstance that the love of money is a stronger passion in his mind than the love of personal liberty is, as far as it goes, a reason for our availing ourselves rather of his love of money than of his love of personal liberty for the purpose of restraining him from crime. To look out systematically for the most sensitive part of a man's mind, in order that we may not direct our penal sanctions towards that part of his mind, seems an injudicious policy.

"We are far from thinking that the course which we propose is unexceptionable; but it appears to us to be less open to exception than any other which has occurred to us. We propose that, at the time of imposing a fine, the Court shall also fix a certain term of imprisonment which the offender shall undergo in default of payment. In fixing this term, the Court will in no case be suffered to exceed a certain maximum, which will vary according to the nature of the offence. If the offence be one which is punishable with imprisonment as well as fine, the term of imprisonment in default of payment will not exceed one-fourth of the longest term of imprisonment fixed by the Code for the offence. If the offence be one which by the Code is punishable only with fine, the term of imprisonment for default of payment will in no case exceed seven days".¹²

Scope.—This section does not include punishment inflicted under s. 75 of the Code.¹³ Similarly it does not affect several sections of certain local Acts.¹⁴

1. 'The term . . . shall not exceed one-fourth of the term of imprisonment . . . fixed for the offence'.—The term of imprisonment in default of payment of a fine should not exceed one-fourth of the maximum term of imprisonment fixed for the offence. Where the accused was convicted under s. 510 of the Penal Code and sentenced to pay a fine of two annas or in default to suffer imprisonment for a day, it was held that the maximum sentence of imprisonment legally awardable was six hours.¹⁵ Accused having been found guilty of an offence under s. 3, cl. 10, of the Towns Nuisances Act (Madras Act III of 1889) punishable with a "fine not exceeding Rs. 50" or "imprisonment of either description not exceeding eight days", was sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 8 and in default to undergo simple imprisonment for a week. It was held that the maximum imprisonment that could be awarded in default of payment of fine was two days.¹⁶ In the case of an assault (s. 352, infra), which is punishable with imprisonment for three months, a sentence inflicting a fine of fifty rupees, and awarding imprisonment for one month in default of payment of the fine, is illegal.¹⁷ A sentence of five months' rigorous imprisonment in default of payment of fine for an offence punishable with one year's imprisonment is illegal.¹⁸ A sentence of three months' imprisonment in default of payment of fine for an offence punishable with six months' rigorous imprisonment is illegal.¹⁹

The word 'offence', denotes here anything punishable under the Code or under any special or local law (s. 40). See s. 25 of the General Clauses Act (X of 1897).

2. 'Punishable with imprisonment as well as fine'.—These words include cases where fine and imprisonment can be awarded and also those where the punishment may be either fine or imprisonment but not both. The only cases that it does not apply to are those dealt with in s. 67 where fine only can be awarded.²⁰

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—In any case decided by a Magistrate where imprisonment has been awarded as part of the substantive sentence, the period of imprisonment awarded in default of payment of the fine shall not exceed one-fourth of the period of imprisonment which such Magistrate is competent to inflict as punishment for the offence otherwise than as imprisonment in default of payment of the fine.²¹ Section 33 of the Criminal Procedure Code does not authorize a Magistrate to pass a sentence in default of payment of fine in excess of the term prescribed by this section.²²

Madras Rule.—In awarding sentences in default of payment of fines, regard should always be had to the status of accused persons and the sentences should be so regulated as to induce them to pay them and not to evade such payment.²³

Patna Circular.—(1) The Nazir will call upon the prisoner to pay the amount of fine. If the fine be paid in full the person fined should be released unless he be also sentenced to substantive imprisonment. The Nazir will then report the fact to the Court on the foil received by him from the Bench Clerk. If the sentence be one of fine only without any imprisonment in default of payment and the fine be paid in part the prisoner will be released and the Nazir will report the fact on the foil to the Court which passed the sentence in order that a warrant may be issued for the realization of the balance. If the sentence be one of fine only and the fine be not paid at all, the Nazir shall apply for a warrant for the realization of the whole amount and other necessary orders. No person, not also under sentence of imprisonment, alternative or otherwise, shall be detained on account of inability to pay the fine. Where the sentence is one of fine, with or without a term of substantive imprisonment, but with an alternative sentence of imprisonment in default of the payment of the fine, if the fine be not wholly satisfied at once, the Nazir shall report to the Court which imposed the sentence for its orders as to the term of imprisonment proportional to the amount still unpaid which, under s. 69 of the Indian Penal Code, the convicted person has yet to undergo. In such cases the fact of the payment of fine, in whole or in part, should be noted on the warrant of imprisonment by the Magistrate who issues it.²⁴

Burma Circular.—The attention of all Courts is called to ss. 64 to 67 inclusive of the Indian Penal Code and also to s. 33 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, relating to sentences of imprisonment in default of payment of fine.

(2) Under s. 65, Indian Penal Code, the term of imprisonment in default must not exceed one-fourth of the maximum term of imprisonment fixed for the offence, if the offence is punishable with imprisonment as well as fine.

This rule applies whether imprisonment is actually awarded or not. It applies to cases where imprisonment or fine, but not both, can be awarded, no less than to cases in which both imprisonment and fine can be imposed.

(3) Subject to the rule in sub-paragraph (2), in cases punishable with imprisonment as well as fine where a sentence of fine only is passed, the Magistrate may award, in default of payment of fine, imprisonment up to the limit of his ordinary powers, e.g., in a case of simple theft under s. 379, Indian Penal Code, if fine only is imposed a Magistrate of the first class may award, in default of payment, imprisonment for nine months, a Magistrate of the second class imprisonment for six months, and a Magistrate of the third class imprisonment for one month.

(4) Where a Magistrate sentences to imprisonment and fine, the period of imprisonment awarded in default of payment of the fine cannot exceed one-fourth of the period which the Magistrate has power to impose substantively. Thus in the case in sub-paragraph (3) a Magistrate of the first class cannot award more than six months, a Magistrate of the second class more than one month and a half, and a Magistrate of the third class more than one week.

(5) If the offence be punishable with fine only, the imprisonment which the Court imposes in default of payment of fine—

(a) must be simple; and

(b) the term for which the Court directs the offender to be imprisoned in default of payment of fine must not exceed two months when the amount of the fine does not exceed Rs. 50, four months when the amount does not exceed Rs. 100, and six months in any other case.

In this case a Magistrate of the third class cannot award imprisonment for more than one month in default of payment of a fine.²⁵

imprisonment for non-payment of fine.

COMMENT.

Imprisonment awarded in default of payment of a fine may be of any kind which may be imposed for the offence.

If the offence is punishable with rigorous imprisonment then the additional imprisonment, in default of payment of fine, must be rigorous.¹

A criminal Court is not competent to direct that sentences of imprisonment imposed for default in payment of fines should run concurrently.²

1. 'Offence'.—This word denotes here anything punishable under the Penal Code, or under any special or local law (s. 40). See s. 25 of the General Clauses Act (X of 1897).

67. If the offence¹ be punishable with fine only, the imprisonment which the Court imposes in default of payment of the fine shall be simple, and the term for which the Court directs the offender to be imprisoned, in default of payment of fine, shall not exceed the following scale, that is to say, for any term not exceeding two months when the amount of the fine shall not exceed fifty rupees, and for any term not exceeding four months when the amount shall not exceed one hundred rupees, and for any term not exceeding six months in any other case.

Imprisonment for non-payment of fine, when offence

only.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section provides for the maximum term of imprisonment which could be awarded in default of payment of a fine where fine is the only punishment for the offence committed. It has no application to offences punishable either with imprisonment or with fine. Such sentences are governed by s. 65.³ The scale refers only to fines actually imposed and not to the maximum amount of fine permitted for the offence.⁴

Its principle is not affected by Ch. XXII of the Criminal Procedure Code. Section 262 of the Criminal Procedure Code, limiting the period of imprisonment in summary trials, has no application when the Magistrate acts under this section. In summary trials imprisonment exceeding three months cannot be inflicted but if imprisonment is an alternative punishment it can exceed three months.⁵

1. 'Offence'.—This word denotes here anything punishable under the Penal Code, or under any special or local law (s. 40). See s. 25 of the General Clauses Act (X of 1897).

Amendment.—The words “the imprisonment which the Court imposes in default of payment of the fine shall be simple and” were inserted by Act VIII of 1892, s. 3.⁶ In the case of hill-tribes to which the Kachin Hill Tribes Regulation (I of 1895) is applied the scale of punishment is different; see Regulation I of 1895, ss. 1 (3) and 3. See also Chin Hills Regulation (V of 1896), s. 3.

PRACTICE.

Procedure Code (s. 33 (1) (a)). It should be noted, however, that s. 33 of the Code of Criminal Procedure does not authorize a Magistrate to pass a sentence in default of payment of fine in excess of the term prescribed by s. 65 of the Penal Code.⁷

68. The imprisonment which is imposed in default of payment of a fine shall terminate whenever that fine is either paid or levied by process of law.

Imprisonment to terminate on payment of fine.

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—Whenever an offender has been sentenced to pay a fine, the Court passing the sentence may take action for the recovery of the fine in either or both of the following ways, that is to say, it may—(a) issue a warrant for the levy of the amount by attachment and sale of any movable property belonging to the offender; (b) issue a warrant to the Collector of the District authorizing him to realise the amount by execution according to civil process against the moveable or immoveable property, or both, of the defaulter: Provided that, if the sentence directs that in default of payment of the fine the offender shall be imprisoned, and if such offender has undergone the whole of such imprisonment in default, no Court shall issue such warrant unless for special reasons to be recorded in writing it considers it necessary to do so.⁸ A warrant issued under s. 386, sub-s. (1), cl. (a), by any Court may be executed within the local limits of the jurisdiction of such Court, and it shall authorize the attachment and sale of any such property without such limits, when endorsed by the District Magistrate or Chief Presidency Magistrate within the local limits of whose jurisdiction such property is found.⁹ When an offender has been sentenced to fine only and to imprisonment in default of payment of the fine, and the fine is not paid forthwith, the Court may—(a) order that the fine shall be payable either in full on or before a date not more than thirty days from the date of the order, or in two or three instalments, of which the first shall be payable on or before a date not more than thirty days from the date of the order and the other or others at an interval or at intervals, as the case may be, of not more than thirty days, and (b) suspend the execution of the sentence of imprisonment and release the offender, on the execution by the offender of a bond, with or without sureties, as the Court thinks fit, conditioned for his appearance before the Court on the date or dates on or before which payment of the fine or the instalments thereof, as the case may be, is to be made; and if the amount of the fine or of any instalment, as the case may be, is not realised on or before the latest date on which it is payable under the order, the Court may direct the sentence of imprisonment to be carried into execution at once. The provisions of sub-s. (1) shall be applicable also in any case in which an order for the payment of money has been made on non-recovery of which imprisonment may be awarded and the money is not paid forthwith; and, if the person against whom the order has been made, on being required to enter into a bond such as is referred to in that subsection, fails to do so, the Court may at once pass sentence of imprisonment.¹⁰ Every warrant for the execution of any sentence may be issued either by the Judge or Magistrate who passed the sentence, or by his successor in office.¹¹

The successor in office of a Judge or Magistrate may levy a fine imposed by his predecessor. But the Court which levies the fine must be the same as the Court which imposed it.¹²

69. If, before the expiration of the term of imprisonment fixed in default of payment, such a proportion of the fine be paid or levied that the term of imprisonment suffered in default of payment is not less than proportional to the part of the fine still unpaid, the imprisonment shall terminate.

ILLUSTRATION.

A is sentenced to a fine of one hundred rupees and to four months' imprisonment in default of payment. Here, if seventy-five rupees of the fine be paid or levied before the expiration of one month of the imprisonment, A will be discharged as soon as the first month has expired. If seventy-five rupees be paid or levied at the time of the expiration of the first month, or at any later time while A continues in imprisonment, A will be immediately discharged. If fifty rupees of the fine be paid or levied before the expiration of two months of the imprisonment, A will be discharged as soon as the two months are completed. If fifty rupees be paid or levied at the time of the expiration of these two months, or at any later time while A continues in imprisonment, A will be immediately discharged.

COMMENT.

If the fine imposed on an accused is paid or levied while he is imprisoned for default of payment, his imprisonment will immediately terminate, and if a proportion of the fine be paid during the imprisonment, a proportional abatement of the imprisonment will take place.¹³

PRACTICE.

Court has no power to refund fine.—Where a prisoner paid a portion of his fine, but that fact not having been communicated to the jailor, he underwent the full term of imprisonment, it was held that, under those circumstances, the Court had no power to order the fine to be refunded.¹⁴ The accused must apply in such a case to the Government.

Calcutta Rule.—Magistrates and sub-divisional officers should be very careful in all cases in which a person is sentenced to imprisonment in default of fine, to see that if the fine or a proportional part of it be paid or levied, immediate information be given to the officer in charge of the jail so that the prisoner may not be kept in illegal confinement.¹⁵

When a fine is imposed in addition to transportation and the whole or part of the fine is levied, it is the duty of the Sessions Judge to inform the authorities at Port Blair of the fact.¹⁶

70. The fine, or any part thereof which remains unpaid, may be levied at any time within six years¹ after the passing of the sentence,² and if, under the sentence, the offender be liable to imprisonment for a longer period than six years, then at any time previous to the expiration of that period; and the death of the offender does not discharge from the liability any property which would, after his death, be legally liable for his debts.³

Fine leviable within six years, or during imprisonment.

Death not to discharge property from liability.

COMMENT.

Imprisonment in default of payment of fine does not liberate the offender from his liability to pay the full amount of fine imposed on him. Such imprisonment is not a discharge or satisfaction of the fine, but is imposed as a punishment for non-payment¹⁷ or contempt or resistance to the due execution of the sentence. The authors of the Code observe: "We do not mean that this imprisonment shall be taken in full satisfaction of the fine. We cannot consent to permit the offender to choose whether he will suffer in his person or in his property. To adopt such a course would be to grant exemption from the punishment of fine to those very persons on whom it is peculiarly desirable that the punishment of fine should be inflicted, to those very persons who dislike that punishment most, and whom the apprehension of that punishment would be most likely to restrain. We therefore propose that the imprisonment which an offender has undergone shall not release him from the pecuniary obligation under which he lies. His person will, indeed, cease to be answerable for the fine; but his property will for a time continue to be so. What we recommend is, that at any time during a certain limited period the fine may be levied on his effects by distress. If the fine is paid or levied while he is imprisoned for default of payment, his imprisonment will immediately terminate, and if a portion of the fine be paid during the imprisonment, a proportional abatement of the imprisonment will take place.

"It may perhaps appear to some persons harsh to imprison a man for non-payment of a fine, and, after he has endured his imprisonment, to take his property by distress in order to realize the fine. But this harshness is rather apparent than real; if the offender, having the means of paying the fine, chooses rather to lie in prison than to part with his money, his case is the very case in which it is most desirable that the fine should be levied, and he is the very convict who has least claim to indulgence. The confinement which he has undergone may be regarded as no more than a reasonable punishment for his obstinate resistance to the due execution of his sentence. If the offender has not the means of paying the fine while he continues liable to it, he will be quit for his imprisonment. There remains another case; that of an offender who, being really unable to pay his fine, lies in prison for a term, and within six years after his sentence acquires property. This case is the only case in which it can, with any plausibility, be maintained that the law, as we have framed it, would operate harshly. Even in this case, it is evident that our law will operate far less harshly than a law which should provide that an offender sentenced to a fine should be imprisoned till the fine should be paid. Under both laws imprisonment is inflicted, under both a fine is exacted. But the one law liberates the offender on payment of the fine, and also fixes a limit beyond which he cannot be detained, in gaol, whether the fine be paid or no. The other law keeps him in confinement till the money is actually paid. It is, therefore, at least as severe as ours on his property, and is immeasurably more severe on his person... The offender who has been sentenced to fine must be considered as a debtor, and, as a debtor, not entitled to any peculiar lenity. It will be difficult to show on what principles a creditor ought to be allowed to employ, for the purpose of recovering a debt from a person who is perhaps only unfortunate, a more stringent mode of procedure than that which the State employs for the purpose of realizing a fine from the property of a criminal. If a temporary imprisonment for debt ought not to cancel the claim of the private creditor, neither ought a temporary imprisonment in default of payment of a fine to cancel the claims of public justice".¹⁸

1. 'May be levied at any time within six years'.—The word 'levying' means the actual realization of the fine. Although, therefore, the application is made within the prescribed period, if the fine is not realised within the period, further proceedings cannot be taken against the convicted person.¹⁹

The bar of six years may save the property of the accused but not his personal arrest. The liability for any sentence of imprisonment awarded in default of payment of fine continues after the expiration of six years.²⁰

2. 'After the passing of the sentence'.—It is the period of imprisonment to which the offender is liable under the sentence which is to count, not the period to which he might have been liable had the sentence been correctly imposed.²¹ In this case the Magistrate had illegally ordered the sentences of imprisonment in default of fine to run concurrently, and it was therefore contended that the period prescribed under this section had not expired. The Court held that the period to which the offender was liable under the sentence was to be counted and not the period to which he might have been liable.

3. 'Death of the offender does not discharge from the liability any property which would...be...liable for his debts'.—Under the amended s. 386, Criminal Procedure Code, movable as well as immovable property of the offender can be sold for realizing the fine.²² A revisional application against a sentence of fine does

Fine once irrecoverable may be recovered if offender obtains property subsequently.—The mere fact that a Magistrate having written off a fine as irrecoverable, is no bar to his taking action to levy the fine within the time allowed by law, if it subsequently appears that the person from whom it was due has acquired the means of paying it.²⁴

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—An offender, who has undergone the full term of imprisonment to which he was sentenced in default of the payment of a fine, is still liable to have the amount levied by distress and sale of his property if the Court for special reasons to be recorded in writing considers it necessary to do so. The Court must act in accordance with the provisions of s. 386 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The warrant issued by a Court passing a sentence, under s. 386, Criminal Procedure Code, to recover fine from an offender is to be deemed as a decree for certain purposes only, and is executed according to the mode laid down in the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, but s. 48, Civil Procedure Code, does not apply to such a warrant. The period during which such a warrant could be executed is governed by this section and by the Indian Limitation Act. A darkhast filed after six years to recover fine by sale of immovable property of the offender is, therefore, time-barred under this section.²⁵

Bombay Circular.—The attention of Sessions Judges and Magistrates is called to s. 70 of the Indian Penal Code, and ss. 386, 387 and 388 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and to the fact that the proviso to s. 386 (1) directs that after the whole of the imprisonment awarded in default of payment of fine has been undergone, no further steps should be taken for the recovery of the fine unless the Court for special reasons to be recorded considers it necessary to do so. In cases where further steps are required, if at any time subsequent to the return of the original warrant and within a period of six years from the passing of the sentence, the fine or any part of it remains unpaid, and the Court, from information gained, has reason to think that there is any movable property belonging to the offender, it should issue a fresh warrant for the attachment and sale of that property within a specified period, returnable within a certain time.¹ When any Court recovers a fine, or any portion thereof, inflicted upon a prisoner who is already in jail, or who is liable to be further detained in jail in default of payment of that fine, such Court shall be held responsible for the immediate communication to the jailor of the amount of the fine so recovered.²

Calcutta Rule.—A warrant issued under s. 386, Criminal Procedure Code, for the levy of a fine should ordinarily be directed to a police-officer (see Form No. XXXVII, Schedule V, Criminal Procedure Code); and the authority issuing it should set a time for the sale and for the return of the warrant. If no one claims the property distrained, the Police have the power of selling it within the time specified in the warrant, without any previous reference to the Magistrate; if a claimant comes forward, then the ownership of the property distrained must be determined by the Magistrate, and not by the Police. If at any time subsequent to the return of the warrant, and within the period of six years from the passing of the sentence, the fine, or any part thereof, remains unpaid (s. 70 of the Penal Code), and the Magistrate has, from information gained in any way, reason to think that any movable property belonging to the offender is within his jurisdiction, he should issue a fresh warrant for the attachment and sale of such property. Such warrant should be made returnable within a time to be definitely fixed therein.³

When a Court of Session realizes a fine imposed by it on an accused person, it shall prepare the usual warrant for the realization of the fine, and shall forward it to the Magistrate of the district concerned with an endorsement thereon to the effect that the fine has been realized.⁴

Patna Circular.—In any case when, under any special or local law, imprisonment in lieu of fine is to be taken as a full satisfaction of the penalty, if the convicted person is sentenced to undergo the imprisonment, the clerk in charge of the Fine Register shall at once obtain a certificate from the Court imposing the sentence that the fine is not to be realized, and the amount of the fine shall, if entered, be struck out of the Register of criminal fines. Nothing here laid down shall interfere with any special directions of law for the attempted realization of fine by distress or otherwise before carrying out any sentence of imprisonment upon the offender.⁵

Lahore Circular.—Fines should never be excessive with reference to the means of the offender, and the amount imposed should always be distinctly explained to the person sentenced.

2. Although section 70 of the Indian Penal Code gives the power to levy a fine at any time within six years or during the term of imprisonment of the offender, if this be more than six years, neither that section nor section 386 of the Code of Criminal Procedure requires that the power should be exercised in every case. The law is permissive and not imperative. When efforts have been made to realize a fine by distress and sale, and when the offender has undergone the imprisonment awarded in default of payment of fine, the Court should exercise its discretion, according to the circumstances of each particular case, as to whether, after the release of the prisoner, any further steps should be taken towards the realization of the fine within the period allowed by law. If there is reason to believe that the offender is able to pay and will not, preferring to undergo imprisonment, the law should be strictly enforced; but if it appears that the fine was not paid for want of means or that its full realization would be ruinous to the offender or his family, it is not desirable that further steps should be taken.⁶

71. Where anything which is an offence¹ is made up of parts, any of which parts is itself an offence, the offender shall not be punished with the punishment of more than one of such his offences, unless it be so expressly provided.

Limit of punishment of offence made up of several offences.

Where anything is an offence falling within two or more separate definitions of any law in force for the time being by which offences are defined or punished,² or where several acts, of which one or more than one would by itself or themselves constitute an offence, constitute, when combined, a different offence,³ the offender shall not be punished with a more severe punishment than the Court which tries him could award for any one of such offences.

(a) A gives Z fifty strokes with a stick. Here A may have committed the offence of voluntarily causing hurt to Z by the whole beating, and also by each of the blows which make up the whole beating. If A were liable to punishment for every blow, he might be imprisoned for fifty years, one for each blow. But he is liable only to one punishment for the whole beating.

(b) But if, while A is beating Z, Y interferes, and A intentionally strikes Y, here, as the blow given to Y is no part of the act whereby A voluntarily causes hurt to Z, A is liable to one punishment for voluntarily causing hurt to Z, and to another for the blow given to Y.

COMMENT.

This section governs the whole Code and regulates the limit of punishment in cases in which the greater offence is made up of two or more minor offences. It is not a rule of adjective law or procedure, but a rule of substantive law regulating the measure of punishment, and it does not, therefore, affect the question of conviction, which relates to the province of procedure.

This section contemplates separate punishments for an offence against the same law and not under different laws.⁷

The rules for assessment of punishment are laid down in ss. 71 and 72 of the Penal Code and s. 35 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.⁸ Section 35 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that when a person is convicted at one trial of two or more offences, the Court may, subject to the provisions of s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code, sentence him, for such offences, to the several punishments prescribed therefor which such Court is competent to inflict; and in the case of consecutive sentences, it shall not be necessary for the Court, by reason only of the aggregate punishment for the several offences being in excess of the punishment which it is competent to inflict on conviction of a single offence, to send the offender for trial before a higher Court. It, therefore, enhances the ordinary powers of sentences given to Magistrates by s. 32, Criminal Procedure Code.

Section 35, Criminal Procedure Code, is amended by Act XVIII of 1928. The word 'distinct' is omitted from the section. It is not therefore necessary that the offences should be distinct in order to enable a Magistrate to pass consecutive sentences, subject to the provisions of s. 71 of the Penal Code.⁹

Section 235 of the Code of Criminal Procedure contains only rules of criminal pleading in regard to joinder of charges, and it does not deal with the sentence to be passed on the charges of the offences mentioned in the several illustrations. It says:

"(1) If, in one series of acts so connected together as to form the same transaction, more offences than one are committed by the same person, he may be charged with, and tried at one trial for, every such offence.

(2) If the acts alleged constitute an offence falling within two or more separate definitions of any law in force for the time being by which offences are defined or punished, the person accused of them may be charged with, and tried at one trial for, each of such offences.

(3) If several acts, of which one or more than one would by itself or themselves constitute an offence, constitute when combined a different offence, the person accused of them may be charged with, and tried at one trial for, the offence constituted by such acts when combined, and for any offence constituted by any one, or more, of such acts.

(4) Nothing contained in this section shall affect the Indian Penal Code, section 71.

ground for such charges. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, two offences under section 211 of the Indian Penal Code.

(f) A, with intent to cause injury to B, falsely accuses him of having committed an offence, knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such charge. On the trial, A gives false evidence against B, intending thereby to cause B to be convicted of a capital offence. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 211 and 194 of the Indian Penal Code.

(g) A, with six others, commits the offences of rioting, grievous hurt and assaulting a public servant endeavouring in the discharge of his duty as such to suppress the riot. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 147, 325 and 152 of the Indian Penal Code.

(h) A threatens B, C and D at the same time with injury to their persons with intent to cause alarm to them. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, each of the three offences under section 506 of the Indian Penal Code.

The separate charges referred to in illustrations (a) to (h) respectively may be tried at the same time.

(i) A wrongfully strikes B with a cane. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 352 and 323 of the Indian Penal Code.

(j) Several stolen sacks of corn are made over to A and B, who know they are stolen property, for the purpose of concealing them. A and B thereupon voluntarily assist each other to conceal the sacks at the bottom of a grain pit. A and B may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 411 and 414 of the Indian Penal Code.

(k) A exposes her child with the knowledge that she is thereby likely to cause its death. The child dies in consequence of such exposure. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 317 and 304 of the Indian Penal Code.

(l) A dishonestly uses a forged document as genuine evidence, in order to convict B, a public servant, of an offence under section 167 of the Indian Penal Code. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under section 471 (read with s. 466) and 196 of the same Code.

(m) A commits robbery on B, and in doing so voluntarily causes hurt to him. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 323, 392 and 394 of the Indian Penal Code."

1. First clause.—The first clause of this section refers to cases similar to ill. (i) to s. 235, Criminal Procedure Code, which says that if A wrongfully strikes B with a cane, A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under ss. 352 and 323 of the Indian Penal Code. Three separate acceptances of deposits from three persons at different times cannot be said to be parts of one composite offence under this clause.¹⁰

The combined effect of this clause and clause (1) of s. 235, Criminal Procedure Code, is exemplified in Nilmony Poddar's case,¹¹ discussed hereafter.

The word 'offence' denotes a thing punishable under the Code or under any special or local law (s. 40).

2. Second clause.—First provision.—This clause has two provisions. The first refers to cases mentioned in cl. (2) of s. 235, Criminal Procedure Code, and the second, to cases covered by cl. (3) of that section. The first provision provides for an act which presents different aspects according to the view which may be taken of the various circumstances constituting the act and which therefore fall within two or more separate definitions of offences.

Where there are two provisions, one specific and the other general, the specific provision ought to be applied in preference to the general one. The applicant was accused of having abetted the personation of a voter at a municipal election in that, not being himself acquainted with the person who came forward to vote, he had, on the advice of others, put his name to a "signature sheet" in token that the thumb-mark made by the voter was that of the person entitled to vote under a certain name on the electoral roll. It was held that, inasmuch as the acts done by the applicant constituted the specific offence provided for by s. 171F, he could only be tried for that offence and could not be tried for abetment of the general offence provided for by s. 465.¹²

When one act constitutes two offences, separate punishment for each offence can only be inflicted if both the offences are against the same law.¹³ Section 26 of the General Clauses Act makes this point clear.

Where a person is found guilty of a criminal act which is punishable under two different sections of the Code, he may be convicted under both the sections, but he should be punished only under that section which imposes the higher penalty.¹⁴ Where a person commits house-trespass and attempts to murder an occupant of the house he may be convicted of both these offences, but a separate sentence for each offence is not justifiable.¹⁵

3. Second provision.—The second provision refers to cases falling under cl. (3) of s. 235 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Illustration (m) is an example of such cases.

'Constitute an offence'.—This phrase "must be understood to refer to the definitions of the offences as enunciated in the Code itself, irrespective of the identity or non-identity of the evidence whereby the several acts are proved".¹⁶

Section 71 of the Penal Code and s. 235 of the Criminal Procedure Code.—Reading s. 235 with s. 71 we get a four-fold result which may be stated thus.¹⁷—

I. A repetition in the same transaction of several criminal acts of exactly the same character may constitute one crime, e.g., a number of blows on one person, a number of lies in one continuous deposition, or a number of articles stolen at one house-breaking. That is a case covered by s. 71 (see ill. (a)). The greater or lesser number of criminal acts may add to or diminish the heinousness of the offence.

Cases.—Theft of property belonging to two persons.—Where the accused stole property at night belonging to two different persons from the same room of a house, it was held that he could not be sentenced separately as for two offences of theft.¹⁸ Stealing two bullocks at the same time belonging to two different owners, which were tied to the yoke of a cart, was held to constitute only one offence of theft.¹⁹ Where the accused, a guard in charge of a goods train, stole articles belonging to two different persons, from separate bags in a truck, it was held that he could not be convicted and sentenced separately for two distinct offences of theft.²⁰

Dacoity in respect of property belonging to two persons.—Where a gang of dacoits, in pursuance of a common object, viz., robbery, attacked at the same time two houses belonging to two different owners in the same village, it was held that they could not be punished separately on separate charges of dacoiting each house, but could only be punished for one offence of dacoity.²¹

Causing two deaths simultaneously.—Where a person caused the death of two children by a rash and negligent act committed at the same time and place, it was held that he could not be punished separately in respect of the death of each child.²²

II. A single transaction may give rise to either—

(1) several offences of a different character, each complete in itself and distinct from the other, e.g., criminal breach of trust accompanied by falsification of accounts as a preliminary or a sequel to such breach; or

(2) several offences of the same character but affecting different persons, e.g., a single gun shot fired with criminal intent which injures two or more persons.

Each such offence is separately indictable and punishable. See sub-section (1) of s. 235 and ill. (b) to s. 71 and ill. (a); (f) and (g) to s. 235.

Where different persons are injured, grievous hurt being caused in one case and simple hurt in others, it is competent for the Court to impose separate and accumulative sentences.²³ But separate sentences cannot be passed under ss. 323 and 326 in the case of an assault upon a single person.²⁴

Cases.—House-breaking to commit mischief and assault, and mischief and assault.—An accused person was convicted under s. 457 of the Penal Code of house-breaking by night in order to commit an offence (mischief and assault) and also under ss. 426 and 352 for the offences of mischief and assault, and punished separately for each offence. These offences formed part of one transaction. It was held that the sentences were legal.²⁵

House-breaking to commit theft and theft in a house.—A person can be convicted of house-breaking by night to commit theft (s. 457) and of theft in a building (s. 380) and punished separately for the two offences.¹

House-breaking after making preparation for causing hurt or assault and committing of rape.—Where the accused committed house-breaking by night after making preparation to cause hurt or assault (s. 458) and then committed rape (s. 376), it was held that separate sentences for both the offences were legal.²

Criminal intimidation to three persons at one time.—An accused person, who threatened three witnesses, was convicted and sentenced to four months' imprisonment for the threat to each witness. It was held that if a person at one time criminally intimidates three different persons, and each of those persons brings a separate charge against him, he may be convicted for an offence as against each person and be punished separately for each offence.³

Resistance to taking of property by public servant, and assaulting him.—Where the accused objected to accompany a constable who had been directed to produce him before the Court, seized the constable by the arm, and resisted his carrying away a pony which the accused was charged with having misappropriated, it was held that he was guilty of separate offences under ss. 358 and 183, and the infliction of separate sentences for each offence was not prevented by this section.⁴

Rioting and hurt, and rescuing from custody.—The accused were charged with, and convicted of, rioting and causing hurt, the common object of the unlawful assembly being the rescue of the first accused who was detained in lawful custody and the first accused was further convicted of and punished for escape under s. 224 and the other accused for rescue under s. 225. It was held that the punishments under ss. 224 and 225 inflicted in addition to those for rioting and hurt were proper, inasmuch as the offences of rioting and escape and rescue were distinct offences, though parts of the same transaction, and did not come within the meaning of this section.⁵ Where the accused in the course of rioting caused hurt also, it was held that they could be convicted of rioting as well as of causing hurt (s. 323) and separate sentences could be passed.⁶ It has been held that separate convictions are legal under ss. 147 and 353,

Penal Code, even when assault is committed in furtherance of the common intention of the unlawful assembly.⁷

Rioting and house-trespass.—Separate sentences for rioting under s. 147 and for house-trespass after preparation for causing hurt under s. 452 can be passed.⁸

Theft and receiving gift to recover stolen property.—Where a person was proved to have committed a theft and also the offence under s. 215, it was held that he might be convicted and sentenced for each of such offences, for the offences were distinct transactions capable of being proved independently of each other. But where the theft is proved not by direct evidence but by inference drawn from the facts which proved the commission of the offence under s. 215 separate convictions and sentences should not be passed.⁹

Theft and lurking house-trespass.—It is possible to commit the offence of lurking house-trespass without stealing anything at all just as it is possible to commit theft in a building without committing lurking house-trespass. The offences are, therefore, quite distinct and hence separate sentences can be passed for each offence.¹⁰

Theft and mischief.—The accused stole a bullock from a jungle, where it was put to graze by its master, a cartman, and then killed it for food. He was convicted of the offence of theft and mischief at one trial and was sentenced separately for each offence. It was held that the sentences were legal.¹¹

Wrongful confinement and assault.—The accused were convicted under ss. 352 and 342 and sentenced separately for each of the offences, the acts found against them being that they seized, dragged, and pushed the complainant to a certain place in order to punish him. It was held that what the accused had been punished for was the whole series of acts, and that series of acts came within the definition both of wrongful confinement and of using criminal force, and, accordingly, the case fell within the second paragraph of this section.¹² Separate sentences may be passed for making a false charge under s. 211 and for giving false evidence under s. 193;¹³ or for kidnapping (s. 363) and for selling for purposes of prostitution (s. 372).¹⁴

Abduction and rape.—Where the accused had forcibly carried away the complainant and had subsequently raped her, it was held that he had brought himself within the purview of s. 366, the moment he forcibly carried her away with the intention required by that section, and the infliction of a separate additional sentence under s. 376 was not contrary to the provisions of this section.¹⁵

Criminal conspiracy and dacoity.—Where a person was convicted for criminal conspiracy (s. 120B) and sentenced to three years' rigorous imprisonment and for dacoity (s. 395) and sentenced to four years' rigorous imprisonment, it was held that this section was not contravened.¹⁶

Rioting and grievous hurt.—The question as to whether a member of an unlawful assembly, some members of which have caused grievous hurt, can be punished for the offence of rioting, as well as for the offence of causing grievous hurt, has led to a divergence of opinion between the High Courts of Calcutta, Patna and Madras on the one hand, and the High Courts of Bombay, Allahabad and Rangoon on the other. All these High Courts, except the Lahore High Court, have unanimously held that where an accused is guilty of riot and has also by his own hands caused grievous hurt, separate sentences may be passed for each of the two offences without regard to the limit of the combined sentences. For the offence of voluntarily causing hurt or of voluntarily causing grievous hurt obviously can be committed without the commission of the offence of rioting, and, in like manner, rioting can be committed without the commission of the two other mentioned offences. In such a case the total punishment can legally exceed the maximum which the Court might pass for any one of the offences.¹⁷ But where the accused is convicted of rioting and of hurt which he has not himself committed, but for which he is liable under s. 149, there is a difference of opinion. The decision of the Privy Council in *Barendra Kumar Ghosh's case*¹⁸ that s. 149 creates a specific offence upholds the view of the Calcutta High Court in Nilmony Poddar's case.¹⁹

The Calcutta High Court in Nilmony's case laid down that separate sentences passed upon persons for the offences of rioting and grievous hurt are not legal where it is found that such persons individually did not commit any act which amounted to voluntarily causing hurt, but were guilty of that offence under s. 149 of the Penal Code.²⁰ Where an Excise Sub-Inspector, on receiving information that some persons were illicitly distilling liquor in some jungles, proceeded thither unaccompanied by a police-officer and, finding his information correct, arrested some persons, and took them to a neighbouring village and asked for the assistance of the Panchayat who, instead of giving assistance, collected men and rescued them from custody and assaulted the Excise Sub-Inspector, it was held that separate sentences should not be passed for rioting and assaulting a public servant in execution of his duty when practically the offence of assaulting the public servant was the common object of the unlawful assembly, the members of which committed such rioting.²¹ In this case their Lordships solved the difficulty by considering the separate sentences passed under ss. 147, 353 and 225 as one consolidated sentence so as to meet the offence of which the accused were convicted. Where the accused was sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment under s. 147 and a further sentence of three years' imprisonment under s. 325 read with s. 149, both sentences being directed to run concurrently, Sanderson, C. J., held that the infliction of separate punishments for the two offences was illegal under para. 1 of this section and it did not make any difference that the sentences were directed to run concurrently. Cuming, J., expressed the opinion that the prohibition in this section against punishing an accused with the punishment of more than one of the offences was obviously met by making all the sentences which had been imposed run concurrently and that where two separate sentences had been passed the illegality did not necessarily attach to the sentence which was passed second in point of time.²² Where a person was charged with rioting under s. 147 and then by reason merely of being a party to the riot or unlawful assembly became liable under s. 304, by the operation of s. 149, on account that one of the other members of the unlawful assembly committed a fatal assault upon another person in prosecution of the common object, it was held that the case came under para. 1 of this section, and separate sentences on each of the two charges were illegal. The sentence on the charge under s. 147 was set aside.²³

The Patna High Court has adopted the view of the Calcutta High Court.²⁴ It has, however, held that if the common object of the accused is to commit an assault, but, in prosecution of that object, grievous hurt or death is caused by the members thereof, this section will not apply and separate sentences under s. 147 or s. 148 and s. 324 or s. 325 read with s. 149 will not be illegal.²⁵

The Madras High Court has followed the Calcutta High Court.¹ It has held, after discussing the opposite views of the Calcutta and the Bombay High Courts, that separate sentences for an offence under ss. 147 and 323 on the one part and ss. 149 and 325 on the other or indeed any constructive offence with reference to s. 149 are illegal under the first paragraph of this section, even though the sentences are made to run concurrently. Accused were convicted of offences under ss. 147 and 323 and under ss. 149 and 325. For each of the convictions under ss. 147 and 323 each of them was sentenced to six months' rigorous imprisonment, and for each of the convictions under ss. 149 and 325 each of them was sentenced to six months' rigorous imprisonment, and the sentences were made to run concurrently. It was held that the separate convictions in such cases were proper, but that the separate sentences though made to run concurrently should not have been passed.²

A Full Bench of the Bombay High Court has decided that where a prisoner is convicted of rioting and of hurt, and the conviction for hurt depends upon the application of s. 149, it is not illegal to pass two sentences, one for riot, and another for hurt; provided the total punishment does not exceed the maximum which the Court might pass for any one of the offences.³ The Bombay view will require reconsideration as the Privy Council has observed that s. 149 creates a specific offence.⁴

Under the amended s. 35 of the Criminal Procedure Code it is competent to a Court to pass separate sentences for offences punishable under ss. 148 and 326, provided the sentences so passed could be passed under any of the two sections, and provided they are not in excess of the powers of the Court passing them.⁵ In this case the application of s. 149 did not arise. The Madras High Court has dissented from this case and held that separate sentences for an offence under ss. 147 and 323 on the one part and ss. 149 and 325 on the other or indeed any constructive offence with reference to s. 149 are illegal under the first paragraph of this section, even though the sentences are made to run concurrently.⁶

The several decisions of the Allahabad High Court are not unanimous on this question. In an early case Straight, J., held that a member of an unlawful assembly, some members of which had caused grievous hurt, could not lawfully be punished for the offence of rioting as well as for the offence of causing grievous hurt.⁷ This case was distinguished and the point was not decided in the full bench case of *Ram Sarup*⁸ because it was found there as a fact that the accused persons had besides taking part in the unlawful assembly committed individual acts of violence with their own hands; but the judgment of Broadhurst, J., expresses a contrary opinion. In two subsequent cases, however, the ruling in Ram Partab's case was not approved of. In the first case,⁹ the facts were that one M, in prosecution of the common object of an unlawful assembly, caused grievous hurt with his own hand. M and other members of the assembly, as to whom it did not appear whether or not any of them personally used force or violence, were convicted of rioting (s. 147) and grievous hurt (s. 325), and were each sentenced to separate terms of imprisonment for each offence. It was held that the sentences were not illegal as the combined periods of imprisonment did not exceed the maximum punishment which could have been awarded under s. 325. Edge,

C. J., said: "The object of s. 149, as I think, in such a case as the present, is to make it clear that an accused who comes within that section, cannot put forward as a defence that it was not his hand which inflicted the grievous hurt". In the second case¹⁰ Mahmood, J., said: "It seems to me that where certain acts constitute more than one offence, whether such offences do or do not fall under the purview of s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code, and the accused is charged and tried for more than one offence and the evidence establishes those offences, the Court is bound to convict him of those offences, though in awarding punishment the provisions of s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code and of s. 35 of the Code of Criminal Procedure would of course have to be duly kept in view". Subsequently in a case,¹¹ Walsh, J., observed: Whether "...there are different definitions of the same offence, or whether the same offence is provided for in different sections or by separate and different provisions in the Code, care should be taken that under no circumstances should the accused be sentenced to a greater punishment than the highest penalty contained in one of the provisions under which he may be convicted. He may be convicted of rioting and also of causing grievous hurt by mere membership of an unlawful assembly, provided the sentence ultimately passed on him does not exceed that provided in section 325". In a subsequent case¹² the Court has adopted the Bombay view. It has held that where more injuries than one are caused by the members of an unlawful assembly they can be convicted of offences both under s. 147 and under s. 323 read with s. 149. In such a case, as soon as the first injury is caused to any person, force is used and the offence of rioting is complete. Subsequent injuries, though inflicted in pursuance of the same common object, would be distinct injuries justifying a conviction under s. 323.

The Rangoon High Court adopting the Bombay view has held that in cases of rioting under s. 147, resulting in grievous hurt, convictions and separate sentences under s. 325 are legal against all the accused who actually join in the assault. Some of these assaults may have resulted in simple hurt, others in grievous hurt, but all the actual assailants are, under s. 149, liable for all the results.¹³

The former Chief Court of the Punjab distinguished the Calcutta Full Bench case of Nilmony Poddar in Nur Khan,¹⁴ in which it held that separate sentences under ss. 147 and 325 were legal inasmuch as each of the offenders might have been convicted individually under s. 325, and further under ss. 149 and 325. It also held that this section was inapplicable to the case of convictions and separate sentences under s. 147 and ss. 149 and 325.¹⁵ On the question going before a full bench, the following two propositions were laid down: (1) Separate sentences for the offence of rioting and grievous hurt cannot be legally imposed upon a member of an unlawful assembly where the offence of rioting was not itself complete until the grievous hurt was actually inflicted, that is to say, where the causing of the hurt was itself the form of force or violence which constituted the offence of rioting. (2) Separate sentences cannot be awarded where the first clause of this section applies, and the offence committed is made up of parts—any of which part is itself an offence, but they can be legally awarded where distinct offences not made up of parts are proved to have been committed by one member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of that assembly, or where the members of it knew that such offences were likely to be committed in prosecution of that object.¹⁶ The Lahore High Court has held that separate sentences under ss. 147 and 323 are not illegal,¹⁷ although in practice it is undoubtedly better to give a single sentence for all the offences or to order the sentences to run concurrently.¹⁸ The application of s. 149 did not arise in these cases.

358. In Manak Chand, (1926) 27 Cr. L. J. 834, [1926] AIR (L) 581, separate sentences under ss. 147 and 353 were declared illegal. The Oudh Chief Court is of opinion that separate sentences under ss. 147 and 452 are legal; Sheo Nath, (1926) 27 Cr. L. J. 1172, 3 O. W. N. 92 (Sup.).

The Nagpur High Court has held that under s. 71 separate sentences for offences under ss. 148 and 325 read with s. 149 cannot be passed against the members of the unlawful assembly except against the particular member who actually caused grievous hurt; such member would be liable to two separate punishments.¹⁹

The Chief Court of Sind has held that it is not correct to say that s. 71 relates not to sentences but to punishments. As the punishment is the sentence, no distinction can be drawn between the two. Section 149 creates a separate offence. Consequently in case of rioting and hurt, where s. 149 is applied, s. 71 must apply, and though separate convictions may be recorded for these separate offences for which a man may be charged and tried at the same trial, according to the provisions of s. 235, Criminal Procedure Code, separate sentences should not be passed.²⁰

The Oudh Chief Court has held that separate sentences under ss. 147, 426/149, 452/149, 325/149 are not illegal.²¹

III. The same series of acts may constitute different offences. All may be charged, but only one offence can be regarded as committed for the purpose of inflicting punishment, e.g., a person who sets fire to a warehouse. Here his act is an offence under s. 435, and also under s. 436, and, though he may be charged for both, he cannot be punished for more than one of these offences. Only one offence has been committed and the punishment must not exceed that applicable to the graver offence. See cl. 2 of s. 71 and sub-s. (2) s. 235.

It is a general rule that when, in the same penal Statute, there are two clauses applicable to the same act of an accused, the punishments are not to be regarded as cumulative, unless it be so expressly provided.²²

Cases.—An accused person cannot be punished at the same time for committing an offence of mischief by fire with intent to destroy a warehouse (s. 436) and for the offence of mischief by fire (s. 435).²³ Where a mother abandoned her child, with the intention of wholly abandoning it, and knowing that such abandonment was likely to cause its death, and the child died in consequence of the abandonment, it was held that she could not be convicted and punished under s. 304 and also under s. 317, but under s. 304 only.²⁴

A person cannot be punished for rioting and also for being a member of an unlawful assembly;²⁵ for rioting and for wrongful confinement, when the common object of the unlawful assembly is the wrongful confinement;¹ for rioting and assaulting a public servant in execution of his duty when the offence of assaulting is the common object of the unlawful assembly;² for rioting with the common object of causing hurt and also for causing hurt;³ for rioting (s. 147) and rescuing a prisoner (s. 225) when the common object of the unlawful assembly was to commit the offence under s. 225;⁴ for counterfeiting coin (s. 232) and for possessing materials for counterfeiting (s. 235);⁵ for rioting with the common object of committing theft and also for theft;⁶ for driving on a public road so rashly as to endanger human life (s. 279) and causing grievous hurt by such rash driving (s. 338);⁷ for causing grievous hurt by a dangerous weapon (s. 326), and for committing robbery or dacoity with attempt to cause grievous hurt (s. 397);⁸ for causing hurt in committing robbery (s. 394) and for using any deadly weapon in committing dacoity (s. 397);⁹ for wrongful confinement (s. 332) and for robbery (s. 392)

IV. An act, in itself an offence, may become either an aggravated form of that offence, or a different offence, when combined with some other acts, innocent or criminal. Here we have a compound offence which, as well as its component minor offence, may be charged under s. 235, sub-s. (3). But if the compound offence is made out, no punishment can be awarded beyond that which can be given in respect of it in virtue of s. 71. For instance, upon the same facts a person may be charged for using criminal force under s. 352 and under s. 152 for the same force against a public servant. But though convicted on both charges, he could not receive a higher punishment than that which is provided by the latter section.

In Malu Arjun's case²⁰ a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court held (1) that a person, who has committed house-breaking in order to commit theft (s. 457) and theft (s. 380), can be charged with, and convicted of, each of these offences; (2) that a Court, in awarding punishment (under this section), should pass one sentence for either of the offences in question, and not a separate one for each offence; (3) that if two sentences are nevertheless passed, and the aggregate of them did not exceed the punishment provided by law for any one of the offences, or the jurisdiction of the Court, that would be an irregularity only, and not an illegality. The Court pointedly remarked: "We are also of opinion that, looking at the illustration and explanation added to section 35 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, it is the intention of the legislature that a Court, in awarding punishment under the provisions of section 71, Indian Penal Code, should pass one sentence for either of the offences in question, and not a separate one for each offence." The illustration and explanation added to s. 35 by Act V of 1898 are now repealed by Act XVIII of 1923 and the word 'distinct' in s. 35 is also deleted. The Statement of Objects and Reasons stated: "The existing Explanation and Illustration to s. 35 have occasioned considerable misunderstanding. It is therefore proposed to omit them and state definitely that s. 35 must be read subject to s. 71". Points (2) and (3) of the decision in Malu Arjun are rendered obsolete by the amendment of s. 35, Criminal Procedure Code. The result of the amendment is to restore the view taken in Bana Punja's case.²¹ The Court may now award separate sentences for offences under s. 380 and s. 454,²² or under s. 382 and s. 457. The Chief Court of Oudh has held likewise.²³

The Calcutta High Court held that house-breaking by night and theft form a single and an entire offence and cannot be punished separately.²⁴ In one case²⁵ it held that a person may be convicted of theft in a building and of house-breaking by night with intent to commit theft, though, if the Judge considers the punishment for the first sufficient, he need not award any additional sentence for the second. But the infliction of separate punishments does not violate the law, provided that the aggregate punishment awarded is not in excess of what the Court could inflict for either of the offences.¹ These decisions are no longer of any authority in view of the amended s. 35 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The Calcutta High Court has considered the effect of the amendment of s. 35, Criminal Procedure Code, and held that where a person is convicted at one trial of the offence of house-breaking with intent to commit theft (s. 457) and of the commission of theft after such house-breaking (s. 380), he can be sentenced to separate sentences in respect of each of those offences. The Court observed: "It would seem...that under the Code of 1898 the Court would not have had power to punish the offender for more than one of these offences. But under the present Code no reference is made to distinct or separable offences, and it is not necessary to consider whether the offence of house-breaking with intent to commit theft and the commission of theft after such house-breaking are distinct offences. For the application of s. 35 we have not only to consider whether the offences are of the nature described in s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code so that the punishment for more than one of the offences is forbidden by that section. Section 71 is in the following terms. The first paragraph provides...It cannot be said that either the house-breaking by night with intent to commit an offence or theft from a dwelling house are offences made up of parts. The offence of house-breaking with intent to commit theft is complete as soon as the house-breaking with that intent is committed. The offender would be liable to conviction even if he was frightened away after breaking into the house without committing theft. Also theft from a dwelling house can be committed without breaking into the house. The next paragraph of s. 71 is as follows...Here there is no case of offences falling within two or more separate definitions. The third paragraph is...Here also the several acts of house-breaking and theft when combined do not constitute a different offence. The case is not covered by the last two paragraphs with reference to which it is provided that the offender shall not be punished with a more severe punishment than the Court which tries him can award for any one of such offences. It would therefore appear that there is nothing in s. 71 of the Indian Penal Code that in any way restricts the power of Court under s. 35 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1923, and under that section the punishments for two offences of which a person is convicted at one trial are to commence one after the expiration of the other unless the Court directs that such punishment shall run concurrently".²

The Patna High Court has held that as s. 35, Criminal Procedure Code, now stands, there is nothing to prevent the Court passing separate sentences for offences under ss. 457 and 380 of the Penal Code. But the question is not of much practical importance as in an overwhelmingly large number of cases the punishment provided for any of these two offences will be sufficient, and if the Court of appeal finds that the trial Court has wrongly passed two separate sentences but the sentences taken together are not excessive, they can be consolidated.³

The Madras High Court has held that an accused, convicted under s. 369 for abducting a child with intent dishonestly to take movable property, cannot also be punished for the theft of a part of the movable property which he intended dishonestly to take through means of the abduction.⁴ Under the present law he can be punished separately and the decision is obsolete.

The Allahabad High Court has held that where a person committed a trespass with the intention of committing mischief, thereby committing criminal trespass, and at the same time committed mischief, he could not receive a punishment more severe than might have been awarded for either of such offences. Turner, J., said: "This provision of the law does not,...prohibit the Court from passing sentence in respect of each offence established, but it declares that the offender must not receive for such offences collectively a punishment more severe than might have been awarded for any one of them, or for the offence formed by their combination".⁵ This view was approved of in a later case in which it was laid down that where more offences than one are proved in respect of which the accused has been charged and tried, a conviction for each offence must follow, whether this section applies to the case or not; and, subject to the provisions of this section, a separate sentence must be passed in respect of each such conviction. In this case the accused were tried for offences under ss. 170 and 383, committed in the same transaction, and it appeared that but for personating a public servant the accused would not have been in a position to commit the act of extortion. It was held that the former offence was completed before the latter had begun; and that separate sentences for each offence were not illegal.⁶ The view taken by Straight, J., in Ajudhia's case⁷ was not approved of. In Ajudhia's case, Straight, J., observed: "Where in the course of one and the same transaction an accused person appears to have perpetrated several acts, directed to one end and object, which together amount to a more serious offence than each of them taken individually by itself would constitute, although for purposes of trial it may be convenient to vary the form of charge and to designate not only the principal but the subsidiary crimes alleged to have been committed, yet in the interests of simplicity and convenience it is best to concentrate the conviction and sentence on the gravest offence proved". In this case a person who broke into a house by night and committed theft therein was charged with and tried for offences under ss. 380 and 457, and was convicted of both those offences, and punished for each with rigorous imprisonment for eighteen months. The High Court convicted him of the offence under s. 457 and sentenced him to rigorous imprisonment for three years, and acquitted him of the offence under s. 380. This case was decided under the Criminal Procedure Code of 1872 (Act X of 1872). In a case decided under the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882 (Act X of 1882) by Straight and Broadhurst, JJ., it was held that, under ss. 35 and 235 of the Criminal Procedure Code, a Magistrate might legally pass a separate sentence of two years' rigorous imprisonment and fine under each of the sections 379 or 380 and 454 of the Penal Code, for house-breaking in order to the commission of theft, and theft, the two offences forming part of the same transaction and being tried together. But a Sessions Judge trying such a case would under no circumstances be justified in passing a sentence of ten years' imprisonment under the latter part of s. 454, and of four years' imprisonment under s. 380. The latter portions of ss. 454 and 457 were framed to include the cases of house-trespassers and house-breakers who had not only intended to commit but had actually committed thefts.⁸ These decisions are no longer of any authority in view of the amended s. 35 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The Allahabad High Court had held that when a man is found guilty of a major offence it is unreasonable that he should also be severely punished for a minor offence included in it.⁹ The offence of a public servant framing an incorrect document with intent to cause injury under s. 167 is included in the offence of forging a document and using it as genuine under ss. 467 and 471 and a conviction both under the provisions of s. 167 and ss. 467-471 is not maintainable.¹⁰ offence, in cases of rioting and hurt, where s. 149 is applied, s. 71 must apply, and that, therefore, though separate convictions may be recorded for these separate offences for which a man may be charged and tried at the same trial, according to the provisions of s. 235 of the Criminal Procedure Code, separate sentences should not be passed. The appellate Court would not interfere if the sentences passed were concurrent and any one did not exceed the sentence which could lawfully be passed for any such offence; that would be a mere irregularity not calling for interference from the appellate Court.¹¹

Amendment.—The last three clauses of the section were added by Act VIII of 1882, s. 4.

Attempt and abetment.—A person cannot be separately punished for attempting as well as for abetting the same offence.¹²

PRACTICE.

A Magistrate of the second class convicted the accused under several sections and sentenced them to several terms amounting to nine months. It was held that this section did not apply and the Magistrate was empowered to pass separate sentences for different offences.¹³

Lahore Rule.—Where a person is convicted of an offence which is made up of parts each of which constituted an offence or when a person is convicted of more offences than one, the limitations imposed by section 71, Indian Penal Code, and section 35, Code of Criminal Procedure, must be adhered to. When a person is convicted of more than one offence, the Court should be careful to pass a separate sentence for each offence, so that if the conviction is set aside on appeal with respect to one of the offences, there will be no room for doubt as to the sentences passed with respect to the rest. The Court has a discretion to make such sentences run concurrently, and this discretion should be exercised so as to make the effective sentence proportionate to the gravity of the offence. Under section 397 of the Criminal Procedure Code (as amended in 1923), the Court has now power to order, in the case of an accused person, who is already undergoing imprisonment for another offence, that a subsequent sentence of imprisonment passed on him shall take effect at once and run concurrently with the sentence he is undergoing.

It happens at times that a sentence which a judge or magistrate can pass under the law is unsuitable in view of all the circumstances of the case. In such cases all that can be done is to make a recommendation to the Provincial Government to take action under sections 401 and 402 of the Criminal Procedure Code. When a Sessions Judge or a Magistrate passing a sentence wishes a case to be brought to the notice of the Provincial Government for remission or commutation of the punishment, he should submit the recommendation with his proceedings through the High Court; otherwise the High Court may hear in appeal a case in which Government has remitted or commuted punishment, without knowing of such remission or commutation.¹⁴

Burma Circular.—When a person is convicted at one trial of two or more distinct offences, it is not necessary for the Court to pass a separate sentence for each offence; the first sentence of sub-section 1 of s. 35 (Code of Criminal Procedure) is permissive, not mandatory.¹⁵

72. In all cases in which judgment is given that a person is guilty of one of several offences specified in the judgment, but that it is doubtful¹ of which of these offences he is guilty, the offender shall be punished for the offence for which the lowest punishment is provided if the same punishment is not provided for all.

COMMENT.

This section applies only to cases where the actual facts of the commission of one of several offences are established but there is doubt as to the application of the law to the proved facts.

The authors of the Code observe : "This provision is intended to prevent an offender whose guilt is fully established from eluding punishment, on the ground that the evidence does not enable the tribunals to pronounce with certainty under what penal provision his case falls.

"Where the doubt is merely between an aggravated and mitigated form of the same offence, the difficulty will not be great. In such cases the offender ought always to be convicted of the minor offence. But the doubt may be between two offences, neither of which is a mitigated form of the other. The doubt, for example, may lie between murder and the aiding of murder. It may be certain, for example, that either A or B murdered Z, and that whichever was the murderer was aided by the other in the commission of the murder; but which committed the murder, and which aided the commission, it may be impossible to ascertain. To suffer both to go unpunished, though it is certain that both are guilty of capital crimes, merely because it is doubtful under what clause each of them is punishable, would be most unreasonable. It appears to us that a conviction in the alternative has this recommendation, that it is altogether free from fiction, that it is exactly consonant to the truth of the facts. If the Court find both A and B guilty of murder, or of aiding murder, the Court affirms that which is not literally true; and on all occasions, but especially in judicial proceedings, there is a strong presumption in favour of literal truth. If the Court finds that A has either murdered Z or aided B to murder Z, and that B has either murdered Z or aided A to murder Z, the Court finds that which is the literal truth; nor will there, under the rule which we have laid down, be the smallest difficulty in prescribing the punishment.

"It is chiefly in cases where property has been fraudulently appropriated that the necessity for such a provision as that which we are considering will be felt. It will often be certain that there has been a fraudulent appropriation of property; and the only doubt will be, whether this fraudulent appropriation was a theft or a criminal breach of trust. To allow the offender to escape unpunished on account of such a doubt would be absurd. To subject him to the punishment of theft, which is the higher of the two crimes, between which the doubt lies, would be grossly unjust. The punishment to which he ought to be liable is evidently that of criminal breach of trust; but that a Court should convict an offender of a criminal breach of trust, when the opinion of the Court perhaps is, that it is an even chance, or more than an even chance, that no trust was ever reposed in him, seems to us an objectionable mode of proceeding. We will not, in this stage of our labours, venture to lay it down as an unbending rule that the tribunals ought never to employ phrases which, though literally false, are conventionally true. Yet we are fully satisfied that the presumption is always strongly in favour of that form of expression which accurately sets forth the real state of the facts. In the case which we have supposed, the real state of the facts is, that the offender has certainly committed either theft or criminal breach of trust, and that the Court does not know which. This ought, therefore, in our opinion, to be the form of the judgment"¹⁶

1. 'Doubtful'.—This section does not apply to a case where the doubt is only as to the existence of particular facts. It applies to cases in which the law applicable to a certain set of facts is doubtful, by reason of the nature of the single act or series of acts done, and in which it is charged, or found proved, that the act or series of acts constitutes one or more or some one of several offences, the doubt being on a matter of law only.¹⁷ To authorize a conviction under this section the doubt must, therefore, be as to which of the offences the accused has committed, not whether he has committed either.

P R A C T I C E .

Procedure.—The Criminal Procedure Code¹⁸ says: "If a single act or series of acts is of such a nature that it is doubtful which of several offences the facts which can be proved will constitute, the accused may be charged with having committed all or any of such offences and any number of such charges may be tried at once; or he may be charged in the alternative with having committed some one of the said offences". The illustrations clearly bring out the purport of this section. A is accused of an act which may amount to theft, or receiving stolen property, or criminal breach of trust or cheating. He may be charged with theft, receiving stolen property, criminal breach of trust and cheating, or he may be charged with having committed theft, or receiving stolen property, or criminal breach of trust or cheating. A states on oath before the Magistrate that he saw B hit C with a club. Before the Sessions Court A states on oath that B never hit C. A may be charged in the alternative and convicted of intentionally giving false evidence, although it cannot be proved which of these contradictory statements was false.

When the conviction is under the Penal Code and it is doubtful under which of two sections, or under which of two parts of the same section, of that Code the offence falls, the Court shall distinctly express the same and pass judgment in the alternative.¹⁹

Punishment.—When an accused person is convicted in the alternative, one of the offences of which he might be guilty being murder, punishable under s. 302, this section so far overrides s. 302 as to admit in such a case of a less punishment than transportation for life being inflicted.²⁰ Where the charge is framed in the alternative in respect of offences under ss. 302 and 201, the position may arise as contemplated by this section. It may be open to the Court to give judgment that a person is guilty of one of several offences specified in the judgment, but that it is doubtful of which of these offences he is guilty. Such a finding is in accordance with s. 367 (3) of the Criminal Procedure Code, and will have the consequence that under this section the offender is to be punished for the offence for which the lowest punishment is provided, the same punishment not being provided for all.²¹

73. Whenever any person is convicted of an offence for which under this Code the Court has power to sentence him to rigorous imprisonment,¹ the Court may, by its sentence, order that the offender shall be kept in solitary confinement for any portion² or portions of the imprisonment to which he is sentenced, not exceeding three months³ in the whole, according to the following scale, that is to say—a time not exceeding one month⁴ if the term of imprisonment shall not exceed six months :

a time not exceeding two months if the term of imprisonment shall exceed six months and shall not exceed one year :

a time not exceeding three months if the term of imprisonment shall exceed one year.

COMMENT.

Solitary confinement means such confinement with or without labour as entirely secludes the prisoner both from sight of, and communication with, other prisoners.

This section gives the scale according to which solitary confinement may be inflicted. In England the power to impose solitary punishment, though it was very rarely exercised by a criminal Court as part of its sentence, has been done away with by 56 & 57 Vic., c. 54. Under the section solitary confinement can only be inflicted where the Court has power to sentence an offender to rigorous imprisonment.

1. 'Offence for which under this Code the Court has power to sentence him to rigorous imprisonment'.—A sentence of solitary confinement can be inflicted only for offences under the Penal Code. It cannot be awarded for offences under Special or Local Acts.²²

2. 'Any portion'.—These words imply that the solitary confinement if inflicted for the whole term of imprisonment is illegal.²³ A prisoner was convicted of hurt and sentenced to fourteen days' rigorous imprisonment, the whole of which was ordered to be passed in solitary confinement. The High Court quashed the order as illegal.²⁴

3. 'Not exceeding three months'.—In the case of simultaneous convictions, the award of separate terms of solitary confinement, which in the aggregate exceed three months, is legal;²⁵ but, as a matter of practice, a sentence of more than three months' solitary confinement should not be passed on a person convicted at one trial of more than one offence. And, in a later case,¹ in which none of these cases was referred to, it was held that such a sentence should not be passed.² The Rangoon High Court has laid down that cumulative sentences of solitary confinement are contrary to the intention of this section.³ Solitary confinement must be a portion of the substantial sentence of rigorous imprisonment, and if the substantive sentences are to be consecutive the periods of solitary confinement cannot possibly be concurrent.⁴

4. 'One month'.—One month signifies thirty days.⁵

Summary trial.—It is not illegal to impose solitary confinement as a part of the sentence in a case tried summarily.⁶

Solitary confinement for imprisonment in lieu of fine.—Where imprisonment does not form part of the substantive sentence, solitary confinement cannot be awarded;⁷ so also, it cannot be awarded as part of the imprisonment in lieu of fine.⁸

Solitary confinement for imprisonment in lieu of whipping.—An award of solitary confinement to a person sentenced to rigorous imprisonment in lieu of whipping is not illegal.⁹

Solitary confinement as part of imprisonment in default of furnishing security for good behaviour.—The imprisonment which a person may be ordered to undergo in default of furnishing security for good behaviour cannot be made to include solitary confinement.¹⁰

Amendment.—The words "shall not exceed one year" were substituted for "be less than a" by Act VIII of 1882, s. 5.

PRACTICE .

Though it is not illegal, yet, as a matter of practice, a sentence of more than three months' solitary confinement should not be passed on a person convicted at one trial of more than one offence.¹¹

Cumulative sentences of solitary confinement are contrary to the intention of this section.¹²

A Magistrate has no power to direct that solitary confinement should be executed in the first week of every month.¹³

It is not enough for a Court to say that the accused is sentenced to the authorized amount of solitary confinement, but the exact period should be clearly mentioned.¹⁴ The Court has no power to order when in each month the sentence shall be inflicted.

The Madras High Court has opined that solitary confinement should not be ordered unless there are special features appearing in evidence such as extreme violence or brutality in the commission of the offence. In the case of a habitual thief such sentence was abrogated.¹⁵

74. In executing a sentence of solitary confinement; such confinement shall in no case exceed fourteen days at a time, with intervals¹ between the periods of solitary confinement of not less duration than such periods, and when the imprisonment awarded shall exceed three months, the solitary confinement shall not exceed seven days in any one month² of the whole imprisonment awarded, with intervals between the periods of solitary confinement of not less duration than such periods.

COMMENT.

Solitary confinement if continued for a long time is sure to produce mental derangement. This section is, therefore, enacted to limit the punishment to fourteen days at a time.

1. 'Fourteen days at a time, with intervals'.—Solitary confinement must be imposed at intervals. A sentence inflicting solitary confinement for the whole term of imprisonment is illegal, though not more than fourteen days is awarded;¹⁶ because the last section provides that the offender shall be kept in solitary confinement for a portion of the imprisonment to which he is sentenced. The whole gist of this section is to prevent any prisoner being kept in solitary confinement continuously or without some break in his punishment.

2. 'Shall not exceed seven days in any one month'.—This provision limits the solitary confinement, when the substantive sentence exceeds three months, to seven days in any one month. A sentence adjudging that a period of three months out of a term of punishment for one year and one day be passed in solitary confinement was held to be illegal, and the Madras High Court reduced the sentence of solitary confinement to eighty-four days.¹⁷ But the former Chief Court of the Punjab held in a case, in which the accused was sentenced to four months' rigorous imprisonment, of which one month was to be passed in solitary confinement, and a fine of Rs. 25 or one month and a half's further rigorous imprisonment in default, that the sentence of one month's solitary confinement was legal notwithstanding that the accused could not lawfully be subjected to more than twenty-eight days' solitary confinement, if the imprisonment continued for only four months.¹⁸

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—Burma Circular (1).—The attention of all Courts is called to ss. 73 and 74 of the Indian Penal Code, which provide for sentences of solitary confinement. These sections should be given effect to in all cases in which it is desired to impose a more severe form of punishment than ordinary rigorous imprisonment.

(2) When any person has undergone a sentence of rigorous imprisonment without the punishment having had a deterrent effect, if he is again convicted and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment, solitary confinement should form part of the sentence, unless there is any special reason for not awarding such punishment.

(3) Solitary confinement may also be awarded upon a first conviction for a serious offence. It is usually preferable to impose a moderate term of imprisonment with solitary confinement rather than a longer term without such addition to enhance the severity of the imprisonment. Sentences of solitary confinement passed for separate offences, whether at the same or more than one trial, should not in the aggregate exceed three months.¹⁹

COMMENT.

This section was introduced by Act III of 1910 in the place of the old one. In introducing the Bill to amend the old section it was said : "The object of the Bill is to amend s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code so as to enable Courts in British India to recognise, for the purposes of that section, previous convictions by the various Courts or tribunals in the territories of Indian States which exercise their jurisdiction under the general or special authority of the [Central Government or of the Crown Representative]. As the law at present stands, a person who, having been convicted by any such Court, is subsequently convicted by a Court in British India, is not liable to the punishment to which he would have been liable if the previous conviction had been obtained in British India.

"This state of the law has been found to cause serious practical difficulties more specially in dealing with habitual offenders, and the amendment proposed in the Bill is designed to remove these difficulties by including convictions by such Court within the scope of the section referred to."²⁰

Object.—The object of this section is to provide for an additional sentence, not for a less severe sentence on a second conviction. Recourse should not be had to it if the punishment provided for the offence is itself sufficient.²¹ The section only enables a Court to pass a sentence commensurate with the gravity of the offence.²²

This section only provides for a maximum sentence, it does not provide for a minimum.²³

Scope.—This section applies to cases in which it is intended to pass sentences more severe than those provided in the Code for the particular offence charged. But that does not involve a complete exclusion from consideration of previous convictions in cases where it is not intended or possible to exceed the limits fixed by the Code.²⁴

The section is not to be employed to enhance enormously the heinousness of petty offences.²⁵ Thus a person having previous convictions cannot be sentenced to transportation for life for stealing a small amount by picking a pocket,¹ or for stealing a tin of ghee (clarified butter),² or for stealing a khas (cloth garment) worth Rs. 4.³

The previous offence must have been committed since the Penal Code came into operation.⁴

Principle.—This section does not constitute a separate offence, but only imposes a liability to enhanced punishment. The meaning of the section is that when an offender having been convicted

(a) by a Court in British India, or

(b) by a Court in any Indian State acting under the authority of the Central Government or of the Crown Representative for an offence under Chapter XII (offences relating to coin and Government stamp) or Chapter XVII (offences against property) of the Code, punishable with three years' imprisonment, commits a similar description of offence after his release from prison, he is liable to increased punishment, on the ground that the punishment undergone has had no effect in preventing a repetition of the crime.

To bring an offence within the terms of this section—

- (1) the offence must be one under either Chapter XII or XVII of the Code ;
- (2) the previous conviction must have been for an offence therein punishable with imprisonment for not less than three years ; and
- (3) the subsequent offence must also be punishable with imprisonment for not less than three years.

1. 'Having been convicted.'—The section declares that if any person, having been convicted of any offence punishable under certain chapters (viz. XII or XVII) of the Code shall be guilty of any offence punishable under those chapters, he shall for every such subsequent offence be liable to the penalties therein declared. Where, therefore, a person committed an offence punishable under Chapter XII or XVII with imprisonment for three years, and, previously to his being convicted of such offence, had committed another such offence, it was held that he was not subject, on being convicted of the second offence, to the enhanced punishment provided by this section.⁵ Similarly, the section does not apply to offences committed at one and the same time;⁶ because it postulates the commission of the offence which forms the subject of the subsequent charge at a period subsequent to the date of the offence of which the accused was before convicted. The accused cannot be charged with a conviction for an offence committed subsequent to the date of the offence for which he is on his trial.⁷

In one case the Calcutta High Court gave a very liberal construction to the expression 'having been convicted'. It said : "The meaning of the law appears to us to be that, when an offender, after having been punished with imprisonment for a crime under Chapter XVII, again, after his release from prison, commits a similar description of crime or a crime punishable under the same chapter, he is liable under s. 75 to enhanced punishment, on the ground that the sentence already borne has had no effect in preventing a repetition of his crime, and has been, therefore, insufficient as a warning. But where the prisoner's conviction has taken place a very short time before, and where no imprisonment under it has yet been undergone, and no time has been given for reformation, it cannot be said that a prisoner has had any opportunity of shewing what the effect of the first sentence would have been upon him, and it would not be just to punish him as though he were an incorrigible offender whom no comparatively light punishment could wean from evil courses."⁸ It is submitted that this interpretation is too wide and is hardly in consonance with the spirit and letter of the section.

A person found guilty of theft having one previous conviction of theft of old date is not a habitual offender.⁹ One previous conviction does not necessarily mean that the convict is a habitual criminal, though a subsequent offence, shortly upon release from jail, is a matter which entitles the Court to impose a more severe sentence than would be the case if there had been no other conviction.¹⁰ A Court may decline to order enhanced punishment where a long period has elapsed since the previous conviction.¹¹ Where the accused, who was convicted twelve years ago, was released after serving six months of his term to join the army and served the army in Mesopotamia for three and a half years, it was held that it was not proper to use his previous conviction for an enhanced sentence under this section.¹²

2. Clause (a).—The conviction must have been by a Court in British India.¹³ The offence should not only be an offence under Chapter XII or Chapter XVII but it should also be punishable with imprisonment for a term of three years or upwards.¹⁴ It is not necessary that the punishment actually awarded for the first offence should have been imprisonment for three years. But both the previous and subsequent offences shall be offences of the class punishable with imprisonment for a term of three years or upwards.¹⁵

This section makes no mention of the procedure—nor does it require that the offence was punished under the Code. All that the section requires is that the offence was punishable under the Code. It is immaterial if as a matter of fact the offence is punished under a special law.¹⁶

Previous conviction before a Court-Martial cannot be taken into consideration with a view to the enhancement of punishment under this section.¹⁷

3. Clause (b).—Under this clause the Court or tribunal in the territory of any Indian State must be acting under the general or special authority of the Central Government or of the Crown Representative. Conviction by a Court in an Indian State which is not under such authority cannot, therefore, be taken into consideration in enhancing punishment under this section.¹⁸

4. 'Subsequent offence'.—These words mean an offence committed subsequently to the previous conviction. A person is not liable to enhanced punishment under this section unless the subsequent conviction is for an offence committed after the previous conviction.¹⁹

5. 'Transportation for life.'—Under this section if a sentence of transportation is awarded it must be for life. The Court can, however, under this section, sentence the offender, in the alternative, to imprisonment, for a term which may extend to ten years and thereafter under the provisions of s. 59 the Court can, instead of awarding sentence of imprisonment, sentence the offender to transportation for a term not less than seven years and not exceeding the term for which under the Code such offender is liable to imprisonment.²⁰

Fine.—The punishment for non-payment of fine should not exceed one-fourth of that fixed for the particular offence proved.²¹

Value of property stolen is no test.—"Too much importance is very generally attached to the value of the property stolen in awarding sentences. The value of the property stolen is very often a mere accident, and the important question is the intention of the man, and his character and attitude towards society."²²

Attempt.—This section does not apply to cases of attempts not specially made offences in Chapters XII and XVII of the Code.²³ Penal statutes are construed strictly: so Chapter XXIII relating to attempts cannot be included within the purview of this section when it specially mentions Chapters XII and XVII. This section does not, therefore, apply to cases which are confined to s. 511 of the Code. The offences which fall under s. 511 must be punished entirely irrespective of this section.²⁴ The Madras High Court has held that although this section does not apply to an offence punishable under s. 511 the fact that the accused had previous convictions can be taken into account and a much higher sentence imposed for the offence under s. 511 than would be proper if there had been no previous convictions.²⁵

Abetment.—The previous conviction of an accused for an offence under Chapters XII and XVII cannot be taken into consideration at a subsequent conviction for abetment of an offence under those Chapters for the purpose of enhancing punishment under this section.¹

Offence under special or local law.—The provisions of this section are confined to offences punishable under the Code only.² Where special Acts of Legislature intend enhanced punishment after previous conviction they have specific provisions.³

Conviction under foreign law.—A conviction under the law of a foreign State which has adopted the Indian Penal Code for the guidance of its Courts is not such a conviction as is intended by this section.⁴

Amendment.—By Act X of 1886, s. 22, the words “or to imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years” were substituted for “or to double the amount of punishment to which he would otherwise have been liable for the same; provided that he shall not in any case be liable to imprisonment for a term exceeding ten years.”⁵ The present section was substituted by Act III of 1910.

The words “in any Indian State acting under the general or special authority of the Central Government or of the Crown Representative” were substituted for the words “in the territories of any Native Prince or State in India acting under the general or special authority of the Governor General in Council or of any Local Government” by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. In Burma, the words “Burma outside British Burma” were substituted for “the territories of any Native Prince or State in India” and the words “General in Council or of any Local Government” were omitted by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937..

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—The evidence as to a previous conviction against the accused under the Penal Code must be clear and precise.⁶ It is the duty of the prosecution to bring to the notice of the Court the existence of previous convictions.⁷ A previous conviction can be proved—(a) by an extract certified under the hand of the officer having the custody of the records of the Court in which such conviction was had to be a copy of the sentence or order, or (b) either by a certificate signed by the officer in charge of the jail in which the punishment or any part thereof was inflicted, or by production of the warrant of commitment under which the punishment was suffered; together with, in each of such cases, evidence as to the identity of the accused person with the person so convicted.⁸

An accused person, though he has several convictions behind him, is entitled to have his case treated as if it was not a foregone conclusion that he is guilty.⁹

Evidence of previous convictions cannot be allowed except where, after the accused has been found guilty, it is necessary to receive it for the purpose of this section, or where the accused having given evidence of good character, the prosecution desires to advance evidence of previous convictions as proof of his bad character.¹⁰

Procedure.—The following procedure is to be observed in the case of trial of persons previously convicted of offences against coinage, stamp-law or property—

(1) Whoever, having been convicted of an offence punishable under Chapter XII or Chapter XVII of the Indian Penal Code with imprisonment for a term of three years or upwards, is again accused of any offence punishable under either of those chapters with imprisonment for a term of three years or upwards, shall, if the Magistrate before whom the case is pending is satisfied that there are sufficient grounds for committing the accused, be committed to the Court of Session or High Court, as the case may be, unless the Magistrate is competent to try the case and is of opinion that he can himself pass an adequate sentence if the accused is convicted: Provided that, if any Magistrate in the district has been invested with powers under s. 30, the case may be transferred to him instead of being committed to the Court of Session.

(2) When any person is committed to the Court of Session or High Court under sub-s. (1), any other person accused jointly with him in the same inquiry or trial shall be similarly committed, unless the Magistrate discharges such other person under s. 209.¹¹

(1). When any person having been convicted—

(a) by a Court in British India of an offence punishable under s. 215, s. 489A, s. 489B, s. 489C, or s. 489D of the Indian Penal Code, or of any offence punishable under Chapter XII or Chapter XVII of that Code, with imprisonment of either description for a term of three years or upwards, or

(b) by a Court or Tribunal in any Indian State acting under the general or special authority of the Central Government or of the Crown Representative, of any offence which would, if committed in British India, have been punishable under any of the aforesaid sections or Chapters of the Indian Penal Code with like imprisonment for a like term, is again convicted of any offence punishable under any of those sections or Chapters with imprisonment for a term of three years or upwards by a High Court, Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, District Magistrate, Sub-divisional Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class, such Court or Magistrate may, if it or he thinks fit, at the time of passing sentence of transportation or imprisonment on such person, also order that his residence and any change of or absence from such residence after release be notified as hereinafter provided for a term not exceeding five years from the date of the expiration of such sentence.

(2) If such conviction is set aside on appeal or otherwise, such order shall become void.

(3) The Provincial Government may make rules to carry out the provisions of this section relating to the notification of residence or change of or absence from residence by released convicts.

(4) An order under this section may also be made by an Appellate Court or by the High Court when exercising its powers of revision.

(5) Any person charged with a breach of any such rule may be tried by a Magistrate of competent jurisdiction in the district in which the place last notified by him as his place of residence is situated.¹²

Record of previous conviction.—Records of previous conviction should not be put in until the close of the trial as they can only be used after conviction in determining the measure of punishment.¹³ In the case of a trial by a jury or with the aid of assess-sors when the accused is charged with an offence and further charged that he is by reason of a previous conviction liable to enhanced punishment or to punishment of a different kind for such subsequent offence, the procedure shall be...as follows, namely:—

(a) Such further charge shall not be read out in Court and the accused shall not be asked to plead thereto, nor shall the same be referred to by the prosecution, or any evidence adduced thereon unless and until,

(i) he has been convicted of the subsequent offence, or

(ii) the jury have delivered their verdict, or the opinions of the assessors have been recorded, on the charge of the subsequent offence.

(b) in the case of a trial held with the aid of assessors, the Court may, in its discretion, proceed or refrain from proceeding with the trial of the accused on the charge of the previous conviction.¹⁴

But evidence of the previous conviction may be given at the trial for the subsequent offence, if the fact of the previous conviction is relevant under the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872.¹⁵

In order to prove the previous convictions standing against an accused person for the purposes of this section it is necessary that the provision of law as contained in s. 511, Criminal Procedure Code, should be observed. A Magistrate who includes in the charge previous convictions without first bringing on the record a formal proof of them and questions the accused in respect of these convictions at the time of explaining the charge acts irregularly and against law.¹⁶

The Lahore High Court lays down the following procedure when a previous conviction is to be proved. When it is proposed to charge an accused person with previous convictions under this section, no evidence on the point should be led before the charge is framed. The accused should not be questioned about his previous convictions when examined under s. 342, as clearly that is only for the purpose of enabling him to explain matters appearing in evidence against him and his previous convictions should not have appeared in evidence against him at this stage. When, however, the Magistrate considers it fit to frame a charge under s. 254 in respect of the substantive offence, he should then have recourse to s. 221 (7) and in that charge should include the previous convictions. He should then ask the accused to plead to that charge making it clear to him that he is pleading to the previous convictions distinctly from the original offence. Then comes s. 255A and under that section if the accused admits his previous conviction or convictions, they do not have to be proved separately and the Magistrate can take them into consideration in convicting and sentencing him for the main offence. If, however, the accused does not admit his previous convictions, the Magistrate has to proceed to judgment on the substantive charge and if that is a judgment of conviction, he has then to take evidence according to law, i.e., under s. 511 of the Code as to the previous convictions and then come to a separate finding upon them after which he will pass the proper sentence under the substantive section read with this section.¹⁷

Jurisdiction.—A Magistrate cannot award punishment beyond his powers (as specified in s. 32, Criminal Procedure Code) because the offender has been previously convicted.¹⁸ If he considers that a more severe sentence than he is empowered to pass is necessary, he should commit the prisoner to the Court of Session.¹⁹ The difference should be noted in a case of previous convictions where under this section enhanced punishment is to be imposed and a case where previous convictions are only to be taken into account for the purpose of necessary punishment imposed by a Magistrate within the limits of the maximum punishment with which the offence is ordinarily punishable.²⁰

Summary trial.—A summary trial under s. 260, Criminal Procedure Code, in a case in which a charge under this section could be framed, is not necessarily bad in law, but a summary trial in such a case is not appropriate and is inexpedient.²¹

Bengal Rule.—Date of previous conviction and sentence to be stated in judgment.—Whenever an enhanced sentence is passed on conviction on a charge within the terms of s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code, the Sessions Judge or Magistrate shall state in his judgment the date of each previous conviction and the sentence passed, as well as the particular offence charged.²²

Allahabad Rule.—In a case to which the provisions of s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code apply, the Court, if it convicts the accused, shall set forth in its judgment each previous conviction, proved against or admitted by the accused, specifying the date of the conviction, the section under which it was had, and the sentence imposed.²³

Patna Circular.—Whenever an enhanced sentence is passed upon an accused on conviction on a charge within the terms of s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code, the Sessions Judge should enter in the column for remarks the date of each previous conviction, the offence charged, and the sentence passed on each occasion.²⁴

Burma Circular.—Under the provisions of s. 221 (7) of the Code of Criminal Procedure as amended, in every case in which there are prima facie grounds for believing the accused to have been previously convicted of an offence, by reason of which previous conviction he is liable to enhanced punishment or punishment of a different kind under the provisions of section 75 of the Penal Code or of any other law, he must be charged with the previous conviction. Form Criminal 82 should be used for this purpose. This rule applies in all cases to which section 75 of the Penal Code or any provision of law allowing enhanced punishment for a second or subsequent offence is applicable, even if the Court does not propose to pass a sentence heavier than the maximum sentence allowed by the substantive section under which the accused is charged.

The accused should be required to plead to the charge of the previous conviction, and if he does not admit it the charge should be tried at the conclusion of the trial for the substantive offence. The charge must be proved in the manner laid down in section 511 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and the Court should record a finding in the judgment as to whether the accused has been previously convicted or not.

The charge of previous conviction, if omitted at the time of framing the charge for the substantive offence, may be added at any time before sentence is passed.

In many cases in which the accused has been previously convicted of a similar offence or of some other offence indicating moral turpitude, but to which no special provision of law allowing enhanced punishment in the case of the second or subsequent conviction applies, it is nevertheless expedient to pass a more severe sentence than would be passed on a first offender in a similar case. In such cases the record must show clearly that the previous convictions have been either admitted or proved.

When the trial is concluded, but before sentence is passed, the Court should proceed to try the previous convictions. Form Criminal 83 should be used for this purpose.²⁵

Oudh Rule.—3. In a case to which the provisions of section 75 of the Indian Penal Code apply, the Court, if it convicts the accused, shall set forth in its judgment each previous conviction proved against or admitted by the accused, specifying the date of the conviction, the section under which it was had, and the sentence imposed.

4. The following persons shall be liable to be classified as "habitual criminals," namely :—

(i) any prisoner convicted of an offence, whose previous conviction or convictions under Chapter XII, XVI, XVII or XVIII of the Indian Penal Code, taken by themselves or with the facts of the present case show that he habitually commits an offence or offences punishable under any or all of those chapters.

(ii) any person committed to or detained in prison under section 123 (read with section 109 or section 110) of the Code of Criminal Procedure ;

(iii) any person convicted of any of the offences specified in (i) above when it appears from the facts of the case, even although no previous conviction has been proved, that he is by habit a member of a gang of dacoits or of thieves or a dealer in slaves or in stolen property ;

(iv) any member of a criminal tribe ;

(v) any person convicted of an offence and sentenced to imprisonment under the corresponding section of the Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure as applied by order under the Indian (Foreign Jurisdiction) Order in Council, 1902, or by the authority of any Prince or State in India ;

(vi) any person convicted by a Court or tribunal acting outside India under the general or special authority of His Majesty of an offence which would have rendered him liable to be classified as an habitual criminal if he had been convicted in a Court established in British India.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this definition the word “conviction” shall include an order made under section 118 read with section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

5. The classification of a convicted person as an habitual criminal should ordinarily be made by the convicting Court, but if the convicting Court omits to do so, such classification may be made by the District Magistrate, or in the absence of an order by the convicting Court or District Magistrate, and pending the result of a reference to the District Magistrate, by the officer in charge of the jail where such convicted person is confined :

Provided that any person classed as an habitual criminal may apply for a revision of the order.

6. The convicting Court or the District Magistrate may, for reasons to be recorded in writing, direct that any convicted person or any person committed to or detained in prison under section 123 read with section 109 or section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure shall not be classified as an habitual criminal and may revise such direction.

7. Convicting Courts or District Magistrates, as the case may be, may revise their own classifications, and the District Magistrate may alter any classification of a prisoner made by a convicting Court or any other authority ; provided that the alteration is made on the basis of facts which were not before such Court or authority.¹

Punishment.—No distinct sentence of imprisonment is awardable on account of a previous conviction as it is not in itself an offence. It is merely a circumstance rendering the offender, convicted of a subsequent offence, liable to a larger measure of punishment.² Although the fact of previous conviction is an element in determining the sentence, essential regard must be had to the facts of the case, the gravity of the offence and the circumstances in which it was committed in assessing the punishment and the mere circumstance that there were previous convictions should not result in the infliction of a sentence that is far out of proportion to the merits of the main case. In the case of a simple theft without any aggravating circumstances a sentence of rigorous imprisonment for one year would more than meet the ends of justice even though the accused might have been convicted on several prior occasions under s. 379.³ The accused, after four previous convictions for theft, was sentenced for a fifth theft of property of no great value to seven years transportation. It was held that the sentence was not excessive.⁴ A sentence should never be heavier than is necessary to deter the criminal from committing the offence again. In the case of men with previous convictions, regard should be had to their career and to the time that has elapsed between the convictions had against them. This section and s. 221 of the Code of Criminal Procedure are not intended for the purpose of automatically enhancing by a kind of geometrical progression the sentence to be passed after a previous conviction.⁵ This section gives no authority for passing a sentence of whipping in addition to any other punishment.⁶ Where the previous convictions are not stated in the charge, they cannot be used for the purpose of enhancing the sentence.⁷

Proof of previous conviction not contemplated by this section may be adduced

after the accused is found guilty, as an element to be taken into consideration in awarding punishment.⁸

In assessing punishment, the Court may take into consideration the accused's character and antecedents or the state of crime in the country or locality. The imposing of a sentence is, within the wide limits allowed by the law, a matter of discretion and not a matter of proof. It is a matter within the sphere of penology, not of evidence.⁹

A Sessions Judge cannot (under this section or otherwise) by amalgamating a sentence which he is competent to pass upon a prisoner with a sentence under which such prisoner is already undergoing imprisonment, and commuting the latter sentence, condemn such prisoner to a longer period of transportation than he is liable to suffer for the crime of which he has last been convicted.¹⁰

Where a previous conviction is proved, the prisoner cannot be dealt with under s. 35, Criminal Procedure Code, as if he had been convicted of two offences.¹¹

Charge.—If the accused having been previously convicted of any offence, is liable, by reason of such previous conviction, to enhanced punishment, or to punishment of a different kind, for a subsequent offence, and it is intended to prove such previous conviction for the purpose of affecting the punishment which the Court may think fit to award for the subsequent offence the fact, date and place of the previous conviction shall be stated in the charge. If such statement has been omitted, the Court may add it at any time before sentence is passed.¹² But it cannot do so after it is passed.¹³ The fact, date and place, of the previous conviction must be stated severally otherwise the accused is not amenable to the terms of this section.¹⁴ A charge of having committed the offence after a previous conviction, therefore, should contain an allegation that the offence has been committed after a previous conviction. A statement in a count that, at the time when the prisoner committed the offence (no offence having been mentioned specifically in the count), he had been previously convicted of offences punishable under Chapter XVII of the Penal Code, is not sufficient.¹⁵ A separate charge under s. 75 of the Penal Code must be framed and recorded if the prisoner is to be tried for an offence punishable under it.¹⁶

The charge after a previous conviction should run thus :—

I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, committed——and thereby committed an offence punishable under section——of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance [or within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court)].

And you, the said——, stand further charged that you, before the committing of the said offence, had been convicted on the——day of——in Calendar No.——of——on the file of——of an offence punishable under Chapter XII (or XVII) of the Indian Penal Code with imprisonment for a term of three years, to wit, the offence of——, which conviction is still in full force and effect, and that you are thereby liable to enhanced punishment under s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said High Court (or the Court of Session) on the said charge.

In all cases in which previous conviction of any offence would render an accused person liable, if convicted on the charges for which he is under trial, to the penalty of whipping as an additional punishment, and it is intended to prove such previous conviction for the purpose of affecting the punishment to be awarded, the Court trying the accused person shall draw up a distinct charge specifying the liability to whipping as an additional punishment and how it arises.

The charge should be to the following effect :—

That at the date previous to the date of the offence of—now charged against you—viz., on the—you—were convicted by the Court of—of the offence of—specified in s. 3 or 4 of the Whipping Act (IV of 1909) and that this conviction of—is still in full force and effect and being a conviction for the same specific offence as that now charged against you, renders you liable in case you should now be again convicted of—to the punishment of whipping in addition to the punishment provided for the said offence by the Indian Penal Code.

Madras Rule.—If it is proposed to prove several previous convictions against an accused person for the purpose of affecting his punishment, they should not be lumped in one head of charge, but should be set forth separately each under a distinct head of charge.¹⁷

The Criminal Rules of Practice require that Magistrates and Judges should append to their judgments a list of previous convictions of the accused. Where the Sessions Judge referred only to one previous conviction, whereas it appeared clear from the fact that the previous conviction was one under this section, and that there were other previous convictions, it was held that the Sessions Judge should have included those previous convictions in his charge under this section and get the accused to plead to them and should then have set them out in a tabular form at the end of his judgment.¹⁸

Burma Circular.—(a) Under the provisions of section 221 (7), Criminal Procedure Code, in every case in which there are prima facie grounds for believing the accused to have been previously convicted of an offence, by reason of which previous conviction he is liable to enhanced punishment or punishment of a different kind for a second or subsequent offence he must be formally charged with the previous conviction. Form Criminal 82 should be used for this purpose. This rule applies in all cases to which section 75 of the Penal Code or any other provision of law allowing enhanced punishment for a second or subsequent offence is applicable, even if the Court does not propose to pass a sentence heavier than the maximum sentence allowed by the substantive section under which the accused is charged.

(b) If the charge of the previous convictions is omitted at the time when the charge of the substantive offence is framed, it may be added at any time before sentence is passed.

(c) Examples of cases in which enhanced punishment may be awarded for a second or subsequent offence, other than under the Penal Code, are section 4 of the Metal Tokens Act, 1889, sections 11 and 12 of the Burma Gambling Act, 1899, and section 46 of the Burma Excise Act, 1917.¹⁹

The Central Provinces Circular.—It seems necessary to point out that all convictions on record at the date of the charge are not always to be reckoned as previous convictions for the purposes of s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code or ss. 3 and 4 of Act VI of 1864. A previous conviction for the purpose of affecting the punishment which a Court is competent to award is a conviction the penalty following which had been undergone by the accused (in whole or in part) at the time when he committed the offence for which he is being tried.

When a person has been convicted at or about the same time of more offences than one and after undergoing accumulated penalties for those offences commits another offence and is again convicted, each of the previous convictions is a separate conviction in relation to the present conviction.

It is not necessary to state previous convictions in the charge unless it is intended to prove them for the purpose of affecting the punishment which the Court is competent to award, that is, in order to render the accused liable to a sentence which could not otherwise have been passed under the law, such as an enhanced sentence under the provisions of s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code, or a sentence of whipping, in addition to other punishment under Act VI of 1864.

Where previous convictions are used, not for the purpose of affecting the punishment to which the accused is legally liable, but merely to influence the Court in determining the amount of punishment which it shall award though they need not be stated in the charge, they should be formally proved if they are not admitted. In using them for this limited purpose the Magistrate should be guided by the analogy of s. 310, Criminal Procedure Code. The judgment should be temporarily closed as soon as the conclusion that the accused is guilty has been arrived at therein. The order sheet should then show that the accused is questioned as to certain previous convictions alleged but not up to that stage admissible in evidence, the actual questions and answers being recorded as a postscript to the examination made under s. 342, Criminal Procedure Code. Whether these convictions are admitted or denied, the documents constituting legal proof of them will of course be filed with the record. Finally, the judgment will be completed and the printed sheet for finding and sentence will then be filled up.²⁰

CHAPTER IV.

GENERAL EXCEPTIONS.

"THIS chapter has been framed in order to obviate the necessity of repeating in every penal clause a considerable number of limitations. Some limitations relate only to a single provision, or to a very small class of provisions...Every such exception evidently ought to be appended to the rule which it is intended to modify. But there are other exceptions which are common to all the penal clauses of the Code, or to a great variety of clauses dispersed over many chapters...It would obviously be inconvenient to repeat these exceptions several times in every page. We have, therefore, placed them in a separate chapter, and we have provided that every definition of an offence, every penal provision, and every illustration of a definition or penal provision, shall be construed subject to the provisions contained in that chapter".¹

The word 'offence' in this Chapter denotes a thing punishable under the Code, or under any special or local law (s. 40). The chapter applies to offences punishable under ss. 121A, 124A, 225A, 225B, 294A and 304A.²

Onus of proving exception lies on accused.—Section 105 of the Indian Evidence Act says that when a person is accused of any offence the burden of proving the existence of circumstances bringing the case within any of the General Exceptions in the Penal Code, or within any special exception or proviso contained in any other part of the same Code or in any law defining the offence, is upon him, and the Court shall presume the absence of such circumstances.³ The Bombay High Court in a Full Bench case has held that this section does not relieve a Judge, even where the accused has not pleaded that his case comes within any particular exception, from pointing out to the jury such facts in the evidence as might justify the jury in taking the view that the accused's case was covered by one or other exception.⁴

Where an accused person has raised pleas inconsistent with a defence which would bring his case within one of the general exceptions he cannot, in appeal, set up a case, upon the evidence taken at his trial, that his act came within such general exception. Circumstances which would bring the case of an accused person within any of the general exceptions can and may be proved from the evidence given for the prosecution or to be found elsewhere in the record. In the absence of such evidence the Court is not competent to assume the existence of those circumstances, more particularly when the pleas taken are inconsistent with the assumption that such circumstances might have existed or that doubt may arise in consequence of such assumption and the accused ought to be given the benefit of the doubt.⁵

76. Nothing is an offence which is done by a person who is, or who by reason of a mistake of fact¹ and not by reason of a mistake of law² in good faith believes himself to be, bound by law³ to do it.

faith that he was commanded by law to do it. It is based on the maxim ignorantia facti excusat. See Comment on s. 79, infra.

Scope.—This and the following three sections leave untouched the liability in a civil suit of the persons who claim their benefit.

1. 'Mistake of fact'.—See Comment under s. 79, infra.

2. 'Mistake of law'.—See Comment under s. 79, infra.

3. 'In good faith believes himself to be, bound by law'.—In reference to this section, Rattigan, J., observed: "To entitle a person to claim the benefit of that section [s. 76] it is necessary to show the existence of a state of facts which would justify the belief in good faith, interpreting the latter expression with reference to Section 52, ...that the person to whom the order was given was bound by law to obey it. Thus in the case of a soldier, the Penal Code does not recognize the mere duty of blind obedience to the commands of a superior as sufficient to protect him from the penal consequences of his act. Difficult as the position may appear to be, the law requires that the soldier should exercise his own judgment, and unless the actual circumstances are of such a character that he may have reasonably entertained the belief that the order was one which he was bound to obey, he will be responsible like any other sane person for his act, although he may have committed it under the erroneous supposition that his superior was by law authorized to issue the order. His mistake in short must be a mistake entertained in good faith on a question of fact. Such a construction of the law may indeed subject the soldier to military penalties, and, in certain cases, place him in the serious dilemma of either refusing to obey an order which he believed to be unjustifiable in fact, thereby rendering himself liable to military law, or, by obeying it, to subject himself to the general criminal law of the land. But on a balance of considerations the Legislature has deemed it wise for the safety of the community that no special exemption should be allowed to a soldier who commits what would ordinarily be a penal offence from that enjoyed by any other person, who does the same act believing in good faith that he is bound by law to do it. A mistake of law in either case would afford no protection, though it might go in mitigation of punishment, and thus military discipline, while it regulates the conduct of the soldier in military matters, is made subject to a higher law in favour of public safety, when the act which the military discipline attempts to enforce or to justify is one which affects the person or property of another. In such a case the civil law looks to the surrounding circumstances to see whether they are of such a character as would lead a man of ordinary intelligence to entertain a reasonable belief that he is bound by law to obey the command of his superior".⁶ Obedience to an illegal order can only be used in mitigation of punishment but cannot be used as a complete defence.⁷

Alison, in his Principles of the Criminal Law of Scotland,⁸ says: "The express command of a Magistrate or officer will exonerate an inferior officer or soldier, unless the command be to do something plainly illegal, or beyond his known duty. If through gross ignorance, or neglect, or design, a Judge or Magistrate pronounce an unlawful sentence, what shall be said of the officers or others who carry it into execution? ...If the order or warrant was plainly illegal, as, for example, to strangle a prisoner in jail, or to poison him, or the like, certainly the mere possession of such a warrant will not prevent the officer who wickedly yields it obedience from being held as art and part in the legal murder, and suffering for its commission. But, on the other hand, if the error was in such a part of the proceedings, as the officer entrusted with its execution has no opportunity of seeing, and is not called upon in duty to examine, and if the warrant put into his hands be fair and in ordinary form, certainly he will not be answerable for any illegality or vice in the previous and to him inscrutable proceedings.

"The same distinction is applicable to the case of a soldier acting in obedience to the orders of his superior officer, with this additional circumstance in his favour, that he is not only in a much humbler station, and trained to more implicit obedience than a legal functionary, but subject to a peculiar and peremptory Code of laws, armed with powers of extraordinary severity, for the express purpose of enforcing on his part the most implicit obedience to command. It will require, therefore, the very strongest case to subject a soldier to punishment for what he does in obedience to the distinct commands of his commanding officer. But still this privilege must have its limits; it is confined to what is commanded in the course of official duty, and which plainly and evidently does not transgress its limits. For what if an officer command a private soldier to commit murder or to steal, or to aid him in a rape, or if he order file of soldiers to fire on an inoffensive multitude, certainly in none of these cases will the privates be exempt from punishment if they yield obedience to such criminal mandates."

For illegal acts, however, neither the orders of a parent nor those of a master will furnish any defence. Section 132 of the Criminal Procedure Code protects a soldier against prosecution for any act done in obedience to any order he is bound to obey.

Liability of private persons to assist police.—Private persons bound to assist the police under s. 42 of the Code of Criminal Procedure would be protected under this section.

CASES.

Lawful arrest of wrong person.—A police-officer came to Bombay from Kanara with a warrant to arrest a person. After reasonable inquiries he arrested the complainant believing in good faith that he was the person to be arrested. The complainant prosecuted the police-officer for wrongful confinement. It was held that the police-officer was protected by this section and was guilty of no offence.⁹

Act done under superior's order.—Nothing but fear of instant death is the defence for a policeman who tortures any one by the order of a superior. The maxim respondeat superior has no application in such a case.¹⁰ Where a naik and three sepoy of a regiment were found on the facts to be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, in that they fired upon a mob which was threatening them under circumstances which did not render the act excusable under this section, and two men were shot dead, it was held that the sepoy, who had fired in obedience to the naik's order, were not protected by this section, as they were cognizant of all the circumstances of the quarrel, and, there being no room for a mistake of fact, they must be taken to have known that the naik was wrong in law in firing upon the mob, and that they were not bound to obey his illegal order.¹¹ A constable verbally ordered two other police constables to arrest bad characters on a road and to fire if resisted. The accused challenged two men and then fired as one of them did not stop and killed one man. It was held that the accused acted unlawfully and should not have been acquitted on a charge of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. A police-officer who commits a wrongful act under the order of his superior officer is liable to punishment as his mistake of law in supposing him authorized cannot be accepted as a good defence though it may be a ground for mitigation of punishment.¹²

English cases.—A gun discharged in the ordinary and regular course of ball practice by an artilleryman in a garrison town, missed the mark, and killed a man who was lawfully passing near the spot in a boat, the place being a public one and open to all people. The artilleryman who fired the gun was acting under the command of a superior officer, who was acting in obedience to the general orders of the Major-General. It was held that the Major-General was not guilty of manslaughter.¹³ A sailor was ordered by his superior officer on board a man-of-war to prevent boats from approaching the ship, and had ammunition given him for that purpose. Boats having persisted, after repeated warnings, in approaching the ship, he fired at one and killed a person. It was held that this was murder although he fired under the impression that it was his duty to do so, as the act was not necessary for the preservation of the ship.¹⁴ A soldier, who commanded the Guards at the trial and execution of Charles I, pleaded at his trial that all he did was as a soldier by the command of his superior officer whom he must obey or die. It was resolved that that was no excuse, for his superior was a traitor, and all who joined with him in that act were traitors and where the command is traitorous the obedience to that command is also traitorous.¹⁵

Bound by law.—Where a defamatory statement was made by a person as a witness in a case, but the person was not bound by law to go into the witness box and make it, it was held that this section did not apply.¹⁶ On an indictment against the engine driver and fireman of a railway train for the manslaughter of persons killed while travelling in a preceding train by running into it, it appeared that on the day in question special instructions had been issued to them, which altered the signal for danger so as to make it mean not 'stop' but 'proceed with caution'. It was held that if the prisoners honestly believed that they were observing them and they were not obviously illegal, they were not criminally responsible.¹⁷

PRACTICE.

Punishment.—Though ignorance of law is not a defence in law, yet it is a matter to be considered in mitigation of punishment.¹⁸

77. Nothing is an offence which is done by a Judge¹ when acting judicially² in the exercise of any power which is, or which in good faith⁸ he believes to be, given to him by law.

COMMENT.

This section protects Judges from criminal process just as the Judicial Officers' Protection Act¹⁹ saves them from civil suits. Section 1 of that Act says: "No Judge, Magistrate, Justice of the Peace, Collector or other person acting judicially shall be liable to be sued in any Civil Court for any act done or ordered to be done by him in the discharge of his judicial duty, whether or not within the limits of his jurisdiction: Provided that he at the time, in good faith, believed himself to have jurisdiction to do or order the act complained of."

The exception in this section is in favour of a Judge only; whereas the Judicial Officers' Protection Act protects every "Judge, Magistrate, Justice of the Peace, Collector or other person acting judicially."

Under this section a Judge is exempted not only in those cases in which he proceeds irregularly in the exercise of a power which the law gives him, but also in cases where he in good faith exceeds his jurisdiction and has no lawful powers.

In a Calcutta case²⁰ Markby, J., said: "The duties which he (a Magistrate) usually performs are of such a nature as to render it absolutely necessary for their due performance that he should have that protection. He has generally either to punish an offence or to vindicate the rights of a private individual; and if he were hampered by fear of the consequences which might arise from a mistaken conclusion, he could not have that independence of mind which is essential to the discharge of such functions as these. This protection is not confined to persons holding and exercising a regular judicial office, but it extends to any person whose duty it is to adjudicate upon the rights or punish the misconduct of any given person, whatever form their proceedings may take, or however informal they may be. This has been so held in England²¹ and I do not see any reason to doubt that the same would be held here."

Scope.—This section does not cover the case of remarks made by a Judge or a Magistrate in the course of his office so as to exempt him from any liability for defamation under s. 500. In such a case the exceptions to s. 499 will apply.²²

the discharge of duties exercisable by a judge or by justices in court, or to administrative duties which need not be performed in court, but in respect of which it is necessary to bring to bear a judicial mind—that is, a mind to determine what is fair and just in respect of the matters under consideration. Justices, for instance, act judicially when administering the law in court and they also act judicially when determining in their private room what is right and fair in some administrative matter brought before them, as, for instance, levying a rate.²³ It is not merely in respect of acts in Court, acts sedente curia, that a Judge has an immunity, but in respect of all acts of a judicial nature.²⁴ An order under the seal of a criminal Court to bring a person in that Court, to be there dealt with on a criminal charge, is an act of a judicial nature, and whether there was any irregularity or error in it, or not, would be dispunishable by ordinary process at law.²⁵ If it be once established that the act in question emanated from, and was appropriate to, the legal duties of the office of a Judge, it must stand as an act purely judicial. Whether such act be done by the Judge in chamber or sedente curia, the privileges connected with the duties of the Judge's situation, and which are given for the public safety and advantage, in which the security and independence of the Judge are interwoven, must necessarily await upon such acts, as if they are judicial.¹

If a party bona fide, and not absurdly, believes that he is acting in pursuance of a statute, he is entitled to the special protection which the Legislature intended for him although he has done an illegal act.²

When there is jurisdiction, but the jurisdiction is exercised under a misapprehension, either with reference to a person not within it or in excess of the power of the tribunal, in such cases the persons acting with judicial authority would not be criminally responsible; but supposing there is no jurisdiction at all, that the whole proceeding is coram non iudice, that the judicial functions are exercised by persons who have not judicial authority or power, and a man's life is taken, that is murder.³

3. 'Good faith'.—See s. 52, supra. Where a criminal information is applied for against a Magistrate, the question for the Court is not whether the act done be found on investigation to be strictly right or not, but whether it proceeded from an unjust, oppressive or corrupt motive, or from mistake or error only.⁴

78. Nothing which is done in pursuance of, or which is warranted by the judgment or order¹ of, a Court of Justice,² if done whilst such judgment or order remains in force, is an offence, notwithstanding the Court may have had no jurisdiction³ to pass such judgment or order, provided the person doing the act in good faith⁴ believes that the Court had such jurisdiction.

Act done pursuant to the judgment or order of Court.

COMMENT.

This section is merely a corollary to s. 77. It affords protection to officers acting under the authority of a judgment or order of a Court of Justice. It differs from s. 77 on the question of jurisdiction. Under it the officer is protected in carrying out an order of a Court which may have no jurisdiction at all, if he believed that the Court had jurisdiction; whereas under s. 77 the Judge must be acting within his jurisdiction to be protected by it. It was Lord Hale's opinion that the order of a Court, having a colour of jurisdiction, though acting erroneously, is enough to justify the ministerial officer.

Mistake of law can be pleaded as a defence under this section.

1. 'Order'.—If the form of the order is not in accordance with law, for example, an oral order for a written one, the persons executing such order are not protected under this section. A person was arrested under s. 478 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On his being brought before the Court, the Judge orally ordered the bailiff to keep him in custody. The bailiff in turn orally ordered a process-server to take charge of him. It was held that the bailiff and the process-server were liable for wrongful confinement as s. 481 of the Civil Procedure Code only authorized a Judge to commit persons to jail under a particular form of order.⁵

2. 'Court of Justice'.—See s. 20, supra.

3. 'Jurisdiction'.—'Jurisdiction' means authority or power to act in a matter, and not authority or power to do an act in a particular manner or form.⁶ A judicial officer, for instance, who, in the discharge of his judicial duties, issues a warrant which he has authority to issue, though the particular form or manner in which he issues it is contrary to law, acts within and not without the limits of his jurisdiction in this sense.⁷

4. 'Good faith'.—See s. 52, supra. The arrest under civil process of a judgment-debtor going to a Court in obedience to a citation to give evidence, and made within the precincts of that Court, and with some show of violence and contempt of Court, was held not to entitle the officers making the arrest to protection under the section.⁸

Protection from civil liability.—The Judicial Officers' Protection Act says that "no officer of any Court or other person, bound to execute the lawful warrants or orders of any such Judge, Magistrate, Justice of the Peace, Collector or other person acting judicially shall be liable to be sued in any Civil Court, for the execution of any warrant or order, which he would be bound to execute, if within the jurisdiction of the person issuing the same."⁹

Protection of police-officers from prosecution or action.—The Police Act¹⁰ says: "When any action of prosecution shall be brought or any proceedings held against any police-officer for any act done by him in such capacity, it shall be lawful for him to plead that such act was done by him under the authority of a warrant issued by a Magistrate. Such plea shall be proved by the production of the warrant directing the act, and purporting to be signed by such Magistrate, and the defendant shall thereupon be entitled to a decree in his favour, notwithstanding any defect of jurisdiction in such Magistrate. No proof of the signature of such Magistrate shall be necessary, unless the Court shall see reason to doubt its being genuine: Provided always that any remedy which the party may have against the authority issuing such warrant shall not be affected by anything contained in this section."

79. Nothing is an offence which is done by any person who is justified by law,¹ or who by reason of a mistake of fact² and not by reason of a mistake of law³ in good faith,⁴ believes himself to be justified by law, in doing it.

COMMENT.

Distinction between ss. 76 and 79.—The distinction between s. 76 and this section is that in the former a person is assumed to be bound, and in the latter to be justified, by law, in other words, the distinction is between a real or supposed legal obligation and a real or supposed legal justification, in doing the particular act.

“Under both (these sections) there must be a bona fide intention to advance the Law, manifested by the circumstances attending the act which is the subject of charge; and the party accused cannot allege generally that he had a good motive, but must allege specially that he believed in good faith that he was bound by Law (s. 76) to do as he did, or that being empowered by Law (s. 79) to act in the matter, he had acted to the best of his judgment exerted in good faith.”¹¹

Distinction between s. 79, Penal Code, and s. 132 of Criminal Procedure Code.—Section 79 can only be applied when all the facts are known, i.e., when the trial is over; s. 132 of the Criminal Procedure Code can only operate before the trial begins. The protection given by s. 79 is a protection against conviction, while the protection given by s. 132 is a protection against trial.¹²

Application of section to special or local law.—The Madras High Court has held that the plea of justification provided by this section is available only for an offence punishable by the Code and not for offences punishable by any special or local law and hence the belief of the accused that he was justified in his act does not exculpate him from punishment for his guilt under the Forest Act.¹³ The Bombay High Court has held to the contrary in a case in which the accused, a contractor engaged by the Public Works Department, quarried stones required for a public road, from a place which was pointed out to him by the officers of that department. The place in question was in a protected forest and no permission was taken of the Forest Department for quarrying. The accused was convicted under the Indian Forest Act, but the High Court quashed the conviction on the ground that the accused was entitled to the protection under this section.¹⁴

1. ‘Justified by law’.—This phrase is used in its proper and strict sense in reference to something needing to be vindicated as being in conformity with law.

There is no justification within the meaning of this section for a husband either under the Hindu or the Mahomedan law to use force or restraint to compel his wife to live with him in spite of the general English law and the provisions of the Code in ss. 339, 340 and 350. The forcible removal of the wife amounts to an offence, and persons who join the husband in doing so are also not protected by this section.¹⁵ An advocate is not justified by the law in asking a Magistrate to return the money received by the Magistrate by way of bribe.¹⁶

2. ‘Mistake of fact’.—‘Mistake’ is not mere forgetfulness.¹⁷ It is a slip “made, not by design, but by mischance.”¹⁸ Mistake, as the term is used in jurisprudence, is an erroneous mental condition, conception, or conviction induced by ignorance, misapprehension, or misunderstanding of the truth, and resulting in some act or omission done or suffered erroneously by one or both of the parties to a transaction, but without its erroneous character being intended or known at the time. It may concern either the law or the facts involved.

A mistake of fact consists in an unconsciousness, ignorance, or forgetfulness of a fact, past or present, material to the transaction, or in the belief of the present existence of a thing material to the transaction, which does not exist, or in the past existence of a thing which has not existed.

Under s. 76 and this section the mistake must be one of fact and not of law. At common law an honest and reasonable belief in the existence of circumstances, which, if true, would make the act for which a prisoner is indicted an innocent act has always been held to be a good defence. . . . Honest and reasonable mistake stands in fact on the same footing as absence of the reasoning faculty, as in infancy, or perversion of that faculty, as in lunacy.¹⁹ If a man, for instance, intending to kill a thief in his own house, kills a member of his family, he will be guilty of no offence.²⁰ "It may be laid down as a general rule that an alleged offender is deemed to have acted under that state of facts which he in good faith and on reasonable grounds believed to exist when he did the act alleged to be an offence".²¹ Where, through a mistake, a man, intending to do a lawful act, does that which is unlawful, here the deed and the will act separately, there is not that conjunction between them which is necessary to form a criminal act. "...ignorantia facti doth excuse, for such an ignorance many times makes the act itself morally involuntary. . . . It is known in war, that it is the greatest offence for a soldier to kill, or so much as to assault his general: suppose then the inferior officer sets his watch, or sentinels, and the general to try the vigilance or courage of his sentinels comes upon them in the night in the posture of an enemy, . . . the sentinel strikes, or shoots him, taking him to be an enemy; his ignorance of the person excuseth his offence".²² Similarly, where a man made a thrust with a sword at a place where, upon reasonable grounds, he supposed a burglar to be, and killed a person who was not a burglar, it was held that he had committed no offence.²³ In other words, he was in the same situation as far as regarded the homicide as if he had killed a burglar.

But where an act is clearly a wrong in itself, and a person, under a mistaken impression as to facts which render it criminal, commits the act, then according to the ratio decidendi in Prince's case,²⁴ he will be guilty of a criminal offence.

Cases.—Mistake of fact.—Good defence.—The accused, a police constable, saw the complainant, early one morning, carrying under his arm three pieces of cloth. Suspecting that the cloth was stolen, he went up to the complainant and questioned him. The complainant gave answers that were not satisfactory and refused to allow the constable to inspect the cloth, and a scuffle thereupon ensued between the two. The complainant was arrested by the constable, but was released by the Inspector of Police. The complainant then prosecuted the constable for wrongful restraint and confinement and the Magistrate convicted the constable of the said offence. The High Court held that the conviction was wrong as the constable acted under a bona fide belief that he was legally justified in detaining what he suspected to be stolen property. The putting of questions to the complainant to clear up his suspicions was an indication of good faith and he was, therefore, protected by this section.²⁵ A chowkidar in good faith took the complainant for a thief and captured him. It was held that he was entitled to the benefit of s. 76 and this section. Campbell, J., said: "If there was any mistake regarding the fact of complainant's being a thief, it was a mistake of fact, and not a mistake of law".¹ Where a person believing in good faith that the object of his assault was not a human being but a ghost, caused fatal injuries on another which resulted in the death of the latter, it was held that in view of the provisions of this section, the accused was not guilty of murder or culpable homicide or even of an offence under s. 304A.² He was protected under this section. Where certain persons went to execute a warrant of arrest against their judgment-debtor, and a palanquin with closed doors was noticed to be coming out of the male apartments of the house, and they believing that the judgment-debtor was effecting his escape in it, stopped it and examined it, although the person accompanying it protested and said there was a lady in it and there turned out to be in it a pardanishin lady of rank, it was held that the accused were protected by this section.³

Abkari Act⁴ and the onus of proving that the act was not an offence was thrown by the Act upon the accused, it was held that the accused had discharged the onus by proving that they believed in good faith that they were not transporting liquor.⁵

English cases.—The prisoner was convicted of bigamy, having gone through the ceremony of marriage within seven years after she had been deserted by her husband. She believed in good faith and on reasonable grounds that her husband was dead. It was held that a bona fide belief on reasonable grounds in the death of the husband at the time of the second marriage afforded a good defence to the indictment, and that the conviction was wrong.⁶ Where a statute prohibited a licensed victualler from supplying liquor to a police constable while on duty, and a victualler did supply liquor to a constable bona fide believing that he was off duty, it was held that he had committed no offence.⁷

Bad defence.—A police-officer saw a horse tied up in B's premises, and because it happened to resemble one which his father had lost a short time previously, he jumped at once to the conclusion that B had either stolen the horse himself, or had purchased it from the thief, and compelled B to account for his possession. He found that B had bought the animal from one S; so he sent for S, charged him with the theft, and compelled him to give bail whilst an investigation was pending. The police-officer never sent for the supposed owner of the horse, or took the trouble of getting any credible information as to whether it was his father's horse or not. It was held that the police-officer had not acted in good faith, that is, with due care and attention, and that this section did not protect him.⁸

English cases.—It is no defence to an indictment for unlawfully taking an unmarried girl under the age of sixteen years out of the possession, and against the will of her father, that the accused bona fide and reasonably believed that the girl was older than sixteen.⁹ One of the grounds for this decision was that, notwithstanding such belief, the prisoner intended to do and did a wrongful or immoral act, and not an innocent act, when he took the girl away. This case may be thus distinguished from Tolson's case, in which the conduct of the woman was not in the smallest degree immoral, but was, on the other hand, perfectly natural and legitimate. The accused was convicted under a statute of receiving lunatics into her house, not being a house duly licensed under the statute, but it was found that though the persons so received were lunatics, the defendant honestly, and on reasonable grounds, believed that they were not lunatics. It was held that such belief was immaterial and that the conviction was right.¹⁰ It is not easy to draw a distinction between Tolson's case, and this case. But the decision in this case appears to have gone on the scope of the Act constituting the offence, and the object for which it was apparently passed. Where a statute made it an offence for any licensed person to sell any intoxicating liquor to any drunken person; and a publican sold such liquor to an intoxicated person who had given no indication of intoxication, and without being aware that the person so served was drunk, it was held that the prohibition was absolute, and that knowledge of the condition of the persons served with liquor was not necessary to constitute the offence.¹¹ Similarly, where a statute imposed penalties on every holder of a license who knowingly sold or delivered any intoxicating liquor to any child under fourteen for consumption by any person, excepting such intoxicating liquors as were sold or delivered in corked and sealed vessels in the prescribed manner, and a licensee delivered liquor to a child under fourteen in a vessel not corked and sealed, it was held that he was liable under the statute, although he honestly believed when he delivered the liquor that the vessel was so corked and sealed.¹²

3. 'Mistake of law'.—A mistake of law happens when a party having full knowledge of the facts comes to an erroneous conclusion as to their legal effect. It is a mistaken opinion or inference arising from an imperfect or incorrect exercise of the judgment upon facts as they really are. Mistake in point of law in criminal cases is no defence. "Ignorance of the municipal law of the kingdom, or of the penalty thereby inflicted upon offenders, doth not excuse any, that is of the age of discretion and compos mentis, from the penalty of the breach of it ; because every person of the age of discretion and compos mentis is bound to know the law, and presumed so to do".¹³

Some of the decisions profess to see a clear and practical distinction between ignorance of law and mistake of law, and assert that much of the confusion in the books upon this subject has grown out of a confounding of the two. Ignorance, it is said, implies passiveness ; mistake implies action. Ignorance does not pretend to knowledge ; but mistake assumes to know. Ignorance may be the result of laches, which is criminal ; mistake argues diligence, which is commendable. But whatever merit this distinction may possess in academic discussion, it has been rejected by the Courts as being a refinement too subtle for application to practical affairs.

"If any individual should infringe it [the statute law of the country] through ignorance or carelessness, he must abide by the consequence of his error;...it is not competent to him to aver in a Court of Justice that he was ignorant of the Criminal Law of the land, and that no Court of Justice is at liberty to receive such a plea".¹⁴

Austin¹⁵ says "that if ignorance of law were admitted as a ground of exemption, the Courts would be involved in questions which it were scarcely possible to solve, and which would render the administration of justice next to impracticable. If ignorance of law were admitted as a ground of exemption, ignorance of law would always be alleged by the party, and the Court, in every case, would be bound to decide the point. . . Whether the party was really ignorant of the law, and was so ignorant of the law that he had no surmise of its provisions, could scarcely be determined by any evidence accessible to others. And for the purpose of determining the cause of his ignorance (its reality being ascertained), it were incumbent upon the tribunal to unravel his previous history, and to search his whole life for the elements of a just solution".

Although ignorance of law does not excuse a person, who does an action which is an offence irrespectively of any guilty knowledge on the part of the alleged offender, yet, when to constitute the offence it must be shown that there was a certain knowledge, the offence is not committed by one who acts without that knowledge, and it is immaterial whether the absence of the knowledge required to constitute the offence proceeded from ignorance of law or ignorance of fact. For, though ignorance of law is no ground of defence, it is evidence of mental condition.¹⁶

The maxim ignorantia juris non excusat, in its application to criminal offences, admits of no exception, not even in the case of a foreigner who cannot reasonably be supposed in fact to know the law of the land.¹⁷ In a case two Frenchmen were charged with wilful murder because they had acted as seconds in a duel in which one man had met his death. They alleged that they were ignorant of the fact that by the law of England killing an adversary in a fair duel amounted to murder. . Coleridge, J., said: "We are told to lay down a different rule to what we should apply to native born subjects, because these persons are foreigners and ignorant of our law relating to duelling. But I agree with the Lord Chief Justice, that foreigners, who come to England, must in this respect be dealt with in the same way as native subjects. Ignorance of the law cannot, in the case of a native, be received as an excuse for a crime, nor can it any more be urged in favour of a foreigner".¹⁸

Ignorance of statute newly passed.—Although a person commits an act which is made an offence for the first time by a statute so recently passed as to render it impossible that any notice of the passing of the statute could have reached the place where the offence has been committed, yet his ignorance of the statute will not save him from punishment. In the case in which this principle has been laid down, the accused, a captain of a vessel, was indicted for maliciously shooting a mariner of another vessel. The latter vessel was sailing without colours and was so conducting herself as to give the accused reasonable ground to think that she was an enemy. However, on boarding her, he found that she was an English vessel, but for some reason he and the captain of the vessel quarrelled. The accused left her and when he got on board his own vessel he ordered three guns to be fired, one of which wounded the mariner. It was insisted on behalf of the accused that he had a right to fire upon the vessel, because the captain did not produce her papers; that he did not shoot at the mariner but at the ship; and that the accused could not be found guilty of the offence with which he was charged, because the Statute 39 Geo. III, c. 37, upon which the accused was indicted, came into force on the 10th May, 1799, and the fact charged in the indictment happened on the 27th June following, when the accused could not know that any such statute existed. The jury said that they were satisfied that the accused did not fire upon the vessel for non-production of her papers, but in consequence of the quarrel which had taken place between him and the captain of the other vessel. Lord Eldon was of opinion that the guns might be considered as shot at each individual on board her; that the accused was, in strict law, guilty within the Statute 39 Geo. III, c. 37, though he could not then know that it had passed; and that his ignorance of that fact could in no otherwise affect the case than that it might be the means of recommending him to a merciful consideration. On a reference to twelve other Judges it was held that the accused could not have been tried if the Statute 39 Geo. III, c. 37, had not passed, and as he could not have known of that statute, they thought it right he should have a pardon.¹⁹ An act, though not unlawful in its commencement, becomes unlawful when a statute makes it so, notwithstanding the ignorance of the doer of the act that any such statute is in force.²⁰ But before a continuous act or proceeding, not originally unlawful, can be treated as unlawful by reason of the passing of an Act of Parliament by which it is in terms made so, a reasonable time must be allowed for its discontinuance; and though ignorance of the law may of itself be no excuse for the master of a vessel who may act in contravention of it, such ignorance may nevertheless be taken into account when it becomes necessary to consider the circumstances under which the act or proceeding alleged to be unlawful was continued and when and how it was discontinued, with a view to determine whether a reasonable time had elapsed without its being discontinued.²¹

Mistake of law.—English cases.—A had set wires in which game was caught. B, a game-keeper, found them, and took the game and wires for the use of the lord of the manor. A demanded them with menaces, and B gave them up. It was found that A had acted under a bona fide impression that the game and wires were his property. It was held that he had committed no offence.²² Where an ignorant person found a five-pound note and appropriated it, not knowing that he was bound by law to endeavour to discover the true owner thereof before converting it to his own use, the Court directed the jury to consider the state of the finder's mind, and ruled that if the jury thought the person really believed the note to be his own by right of finding the jury should not bring in a verdict of guilty. Coleridge, J., said: "Ignorance of the law cannot excuse any person; but, at the same time, when the question is, with what intent a person takes, we cannot help looking into his state of mind; as, if a person take what he believes to be his own, it is impossible to say that he is guilty of felony".²³

Indian cases.—The accused went to the complainant's house with a bailiff to execute a distress warrant. The bailiff called out the name of the judgment-debtor, but there was no reply. The wife of the judgment-debtor, who was absent, was sitting in the verandah. The accused, who was the judgment-creditor, thereupon raised the curtain of the door. The lady inside, who was pardanashin lady, seeing strangers standing in front of her door which was open, went to the door to shut it. The accused gave the door a push and the lady gave a shriek and fell down. She was in great pain and unconscious. It was held that the accused was guilty under s. 352. He was not the person executing process, he was merely a person executing a decree accompanying the person executing process for the purpose of pointing out property; in the circumstances he was not entitled to push open the door; it was for the bailiff to take such action as was necessary under s. 62, Civil Procedure Code.²⁴

Mistake of fact as well as of law.—In civil causes, it seems that if law and fact are blended as a mixed question, or if one's ignorance of fact is produced by ignorance of law, the whole is treated as ignorance of fact, of which the party may take advantage.²⁵

4. 'Good faith.'—See s. 52, supra. To satisfy the Court of his good faith, a person must show at least that he acted advisedly, and that he had reasonable ground prima facie for believing that he ought to do what he did.¹

"Good faith" requires not logical infallibility but due care and attention. But how far erroneous actions or statements are to be imputed to want of due care and caution, must in each case be considered with reference to the general circumstances and the capacity and intelligence of the person whose conduct is in question.² When a person does a thing in good faith, but subsequently commits a mistake of fact, he is entitled to the protection afforded by this section.³ The question of good faith is always a question of fact to be determined in accordance with the proved facts and circumstances of each case.

Where in a case under the Child Marriage Restraint Act, the defence put forward was that the applicants were misled by a certificate granted by the woman medical officer in charge of a hospital to the effect that the girl was not less than fourteen years of age, but according to the civil surgeon, the girl was about twelve years of age only and no evidence was produced to contradict the civil surgeon, it was held that the accused should have gone to the civil surgeon in order to obtain a certificate and that the fact of their having secured a certificate from the woman medical officer was not material although the existence of the certificate was a matter which might be taken into account in considering whether imprisonment or fine should be ordered.⁴

The defence of good faith is expressly excluded by this section in regard to a mistake on a point of law.

"Good faith" and "mistake of law" are no defences to a charge of bigamy.⁵

Act of State.—Stephen⁶ says: "I understand by an act of State an act injurious to the person or to the property of some person who is not at the time of that act a subject of Her Majesty; which act is done by any representative of Her Majesty's authority, civil or military, and is either previously sanctioned or subsequently ratified by Her Majesty...

"When an act of this sort is an act of open war, duly proclaimed, there can be no doubt at all that it does not amount to a crime. However unjust a war might be, and however cruelly it might be carried on, there can be no question that the acts done in such a war by the orders of military and naval commanders do not fall under the notice of the ordinary criminal law. If England were invaded, and if, for military reasons, unarmed prisoners after resistance had ceased, were to be put to death by an English general, I do not think that a court of law would inquire whether his conduct was proper or not. As soon as it appeared that what was done was an act of war the matter would be at an end...

"The difficulty arises when acts which are in their nature warlike are done in time of peace...

"I think that if such acts are done by public authority, or, having been done, are ratified by public authority, they fall outside the sphere of the criminal law...

"I do not know that the principle has ever been tested by a criminal prosecution, but it has been repeatedly affirmed in civil cases; and if a man is not even liable civilly for an act of State, it would seem to follow a fortiori that he cannot be liable criminally....

"In order to avoid misconception, it is necessary to observe that the doctrine as to acts of State can apply only to acts which affect foreigners, and which are done by the orders or with the ratification of the sovereign. As between the sovereign and his subjects there can be no such thing as an act of State. Courts of law are established for the express purpose of limiting public authority in its conduct towards individuals. If one British subject puts another to death or destroys his property by the express command of the King, that command is no protection to the person who executes it unless it is in itself lawful, and it is the duty of the proper courts of justice to determine whether it is lawful or not. On this ground the courts were prepared to examine into the legality of the acts done under Governor Eyre's authority in the suppression of the insurrection in Jamaica. The acts affected British subjects only. But as between British subjects and foreigners, the orders of the Crown justify what they command so far as British courts of justice are concerned."

The test whether an act is or is not an act of State excluding the jurisdiction of the Courts, is not whether it is capable of being legally performed only by persons specially empowered in that behalf as authorized by the law to perform specific acts of Government, but whether it is an act of State in those external relations, which municipal or positive law addressed by political superiors to political inferiors does not profess to regulate. An act of State in respect of which the jurisdiction of the Courts is barred must be an act which does not purport to be done under colour of a legal title at all and which could neither assert nor violate any right conferrable by law, but which must rest for its jurisdiction on considerations of external politics and inter-statal duties and rights;⁷ for instance, a seizure of territory by the British Government as a sovereign power⁸, or an act done by an agent of Government in his political capacity⁹, or an order of the Governor-General in Council deposing the ruler of a Native State.¹⁰

The acts of State of which municipal Courts in India are debarred from taking cognizance are acts done in the exercise of sovereign powers, which do not profess to be justified by municipal law. Where an act complained of is professedly done under the sanction of municipal law, and in the exercise of powers conferred by that law, the fact that it is done by the sovereign power, and is not an act which could possibly be done by a private individual does not oust the jurisdiction of the civil Courts.¹¹ The legality of the sovereign's acts towards his own subjects can be questioned in civil Courts.¹² A British Court may inquire into the character of the act of the Governor of a foreign State, and is not bound to accept it as an act of State.¹³

Persons carrying out an act of State under proper order will be protected by the Penal Code in the same way as if they were carrying out a lawful order under the municipal law.

To support a plea of this nature two things are essential:—(1) that the defendant had authority to act on behalf of the Crown in the matter; and (2) that in so acting, he was professing to act as a matter of policy, outside the law, and not as a matter of right within the law.

Martial law.—The proclamation of martial law is, in fact, no more than a declaration, that under circumstances of urgent public danger, all law is for a time suspended, and that for the safety of the State the Government deems it necessary to set aside the ordinary rules of law by a military force, and to proceed summarily to put down the rebellion, or to punish those who are concerned in it. Courts-martial are employed on such occasions, in order to guard against the danger of subjecting innocent persons to military executions, by instituting an inquiry, necessarily only summary, into the guilt of the parties whose immediate punishment is necessary for the restoration of tranquillity and the suppression of rebellion. But courts-martial so assembled have nothing in common with the tribunals bearing the same name, which, under the Mutiny Act, take cognizance of military offences, &c. Courts-martial of such description have powers lawfully defined by the laws under which they are created, and the sentences passed become matters of record, which can be enforced by the military authorities, which is not the case with courts-martial assembled for the punishment of rebels, under proclamation of martial law, without the sanction of any positive enactment. Sentences of such Courts add nothing to the legality of the punishments inflicted, and serve only to show that those punishments have not been inflicted without due inquiry into the guilt of those who were subjected to them. Accordingly, it is the practice, when martial law has been exercised and punishments have been inflicted under it, that where the danger is over, the legislature should be applied to for laws of indemnity for the security of those by whom these powers have been exercised, and for whom there is no legal warrant, however necessary it may have been to assume them."¹⁴

The civil Courts have no jurisdiction durante bello to interfere with the decision of a military Court sitting in a martial law area, even where a capital sentence has been pronounced, and is about to be executed, for an offence not punishable capitally under the ordinary criminal law.¹⁵ The High Court in Ireland has held that it has the power when its jurisdiction is invoked to decide whether a state of war exists which justifies the application of martial law; but once such a condition of affairs is established to the satisfaction of the Court, it cannot interfere to determine what is or what is not necessary.¹⁶

The Bombay High Court has laid down in Emperor v. Chanappa Shantirappa ¹⁷: "Where a state of war, or insurrection amounting to war, exists, it is competent for the Crown, in the exercise of its prerogative, to place the country affected under martial law. Martial law in that sense, . . . is no law at all; the ordinary Courts ex hypothesi are not functioning except under military protection, and the effect of martial law . . . is to substitute for the ordinary law of the land the will of the military commander. The liberty, property, and even the lives, of the persons in the affected area are placed at the mercy of the military. But . . . the Crown can only declare martial law in cases of absolute necessity, and when the necessity ends normal legal conditions are automatically restored. Where martial law has been declared it is competent for the Courts—and is indeed the duty of the Courts if called upon—after the restoration of normal conditions to decide whether and to what extent martial law was justified."¹⁸

As to the handing over charge by civil authorities to the military authorities the following points are established:—"Firstly, a state of war and armed rebellion or insurrection must exist and not merely a state of riot which could be put down with the aid of the military and other citizens. Secondly, neither the military nor citizens can refuse or impose conditions on such aid. Thirdly, the necessity must be proved, not merely of recourse to the military but also of the impossibility of functioning of the ordinary civil laws and the necessity of their abolition for the time being, and the Courts have power to go into the question whether such necessity existed. Fourthly, it is only when the existence of war, whether against foreigners or rebels, and necessity are established, that the jurisdiction of the Courts ceases. Fifthly, the powers exercised by the military commonly but incorrectly known as 'martial law' in fact are no law at all and would be, if the fact of necessity for a war is not established, illegal, and therefore need Acts of Indemnity, if they are not to be questioned..."

"It is only when practically the entire population of a certain area is so widely and so deeply disaffected and so armed that it is able to enforce its own law and the King's law and writ do not run that an armed rebellion or insurrection as distinguished from riot can be said to exist and necessity to arise..."

"The justification for the acts of the military lies not merely in their bona fides but in the existence of necessity, i.e., in the proof of such a state of war, insurrection or armed resistance as to justify the cessation of the ordinary law and its replacement by military force pure and simple. The question of necessity or whether the proved facts amount to necessity is a question of fact for the Courts. If necessity is proved, . . . then the acts of the military are not justiciable by the ordinary Courts. Unless it is proved, they are so justiciable."¹⁹

"The civil authorities are not entitled to abrogate their duties and to hand over control to the military except in cases of necessity...inasmuch as martial law is no law at all. The existence of martial law...places all citizens in the area to which it extends under the unfettered control of the military authorities, whose acts are not justiciable by the civil Courts...It is...plainly the duty of the civil authorities, assisted by all loyal subjects, whether civil or military, to carry on the civil administration, and not to hand over control to the military, unless the necessity of the case demands it...It is undoubtedly the duty of the Courts, if the necessity is challenged, to enquire into the matter, and if the necessity is not established, then any persons who have committed acts not sanction-

Liability of private persons.—Private persons acting under ss. 43, 59, 77 and 78 of the Code of Criminal Procedure²¹ will be protected under this section.

If an offender resists arrest and attempts to escape, a person who is bound by law to assist in arresting the offender and in preventing his escape is entitled to use all means necessary to effect the arrest short of causing death.²²

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—Jurisdiction.—Act of State.—It is within the province of municipal Courts to determine the true character of the acts done by a public functionary, though it may be that, when it is established that the particular act in question is really an act of State policy done under the authority of the Crown, the defence is complete, and the Courts can take no further cognizance of it.²³

Punishment.—Ignorance of law is no defence, but it is a matter to be taken into consideration in mitigation of punishment.²⁴

80. Nothing is an offence which is done by accident¹ or misfortune, and without any criminal intention² or knowledge in the doing of a lawful act in a lawful manner by lawful means and with proper care and caution.

ILLUSTRATION.

A is at work with a hatchet; the head flies off and kills a man who is standing by. Here, if there was no want of proper caution on the part of A, his act is excusable and not an offence.

COMMENT.

This section exempts the doer of an innocent or lawful act in an innocent or lawful manner from any unforeseen evil result that may ensue from accident or misfortune. If either of these two elements is wanting the act will not be excused on the ground of accident.

1. 'Accident.'—An accident is not the same as an occurrence, but is something that happens out of the ordinary course of things.²⁵ An effect is said to be accidental when the act by which it is caused is not done with the intention of causing it, and when its occurrence as a consequence of such act is not so probable that a person of ordinary prudence ought, under the circumstances in which it is done, to take reasonable precautions against it.¹ The idea of something fortuitous and unexpected is involved in the word 'accident'.² An injury is said to be accidentally caused whensoever it is neither wilfully nor negligently caused.³ Accused was beating a person with his fists when the latter's wife with a baby on her shoulder interfered. Accused hit at the woman but the blow accidentally struck the baby and two days later it died from the effects of the blow. It was held that although the child was hit by accident the accused's act was not covered by this section inasmuch as he was not at the time doing a lawful act.⁴

The following illustrations given in Stephen's Digest of Criminal Law⁵ further elucidate the nature of acts that may be regarded as accidental:—

(1) A, a schoolmaster, corrects a scholar in a manner not intended or likely to injure him, using due care. The scholar dies. Such a death is accidental.

(3) A, a workman, throws snow from a roof, giving proper warning. A passenger is nevertheless killed. Such a death is accidental.

(4) A takes up a gun, not knowing whether it is loaded or not, points it in sport at B and pulls the trigger. B is shot dead. Such a death is not accidental. If A had reason to believe that the gun was not loaded, the death would have been accidental, although he had not used every possible precaution to ascertain whether the gun was loaded or not.

CASES.

Shooting accident.—Two men, accused and deceased, went into a jungle, shikaring porcupines. They agreed to take up certain positions in the jungle and lie in wait for game. This was done. After a while, the accused heard a rustle, and believing it was a porcupine fired in that direction. The shot, however, reached his companion and caused his death. It was held that the accused was protected by this section, the affair being a pure accident.⁶ The accused, a young man, with several companions, went to shoot a pig. He took up his position and waited in the jungle while his companions proceeded to beat the pig towards him. A boar was driven in his direction and the accused fired. The ball, however, missed the boar and hit one of the beaters causing his immediate death. It was held that the death was the result of an accident and was not due to any such negligence on the part of the accused as would bring his act within the purview of s. 304A of the Penal Code and the accused was not guilty of any offence.⁷

English cases.—A man found a pistol in the street, which he had reason to believe was not loaded, having tried it with a rammer; he carried it home and showed it to his wife; and she standing before him he pulled up the cock, and touched the trigger. The pistol went off and killed the woman. The rammer, perhaps, was too short and deceived him. It was held that the man was guilty of manslaughter. Foster thinks that this is an extremely hard case "because accidents of this lamentable kind may be the lot of the wisest and the best of mankind, and most commonly fall amongst the nearest friends and relations."⁸ A man and his wife went to take dinner at the house of a friend. He carried his gun with him, hoping to meet with some diversion by the way; but before he went to dinner he discharged it, and set it up in a private place in his friend's house. He went to church after dinner and in the evening returned home bringing his gun with him, which was carried into the room where his wife was, she having brought it part of the way. He taking it up touched the trigger, and the gun went off and killed the wife, whom he dearly loved. It came out in evidence, that, while the man was at church, a person belonging to the family had privately taken the gun out to shoot and had returned it loaded to the place where it was put in the friend's house. The accused was acquitted on the ground that he had reasonable grounds to believe that the gun was not loaded.⁹ A person was charged with having fired a fowling-piece loaded with small shot, in a field within an easy shot of a high road, where persons frequently passed, and in the direction of the road, and killed a girl passing at the time. It appeared that the shot was really a long one, being above fifty yards, and that it proved fatal only by one of the leads having unfortunately penetrated the child's eye, while the other shot hardly penetrated the skin. It was held that the death was accidental.¹⁰

Explanation.—It is a question of fact in such a case whether the harm to be prevented or avoided was of such a nature and so imminent as to justify or excuse the risk of doing the act with the knowledge that it was likely to cause harm.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A, the captain of a steam vessel, suddenly and without any fault or negligence on his part, finds himself in such a position that, before he can stop his vessel, he must inevitably run down a boat B, with twenty or thirty passengers on board, unless he changes the course of his vessel, and that, by changing his course, he must incur risk of running down a boat C with only two passengers on board, which he may possibly clear. Here, if A alters his course without any intention to run down the boat C and in good faith for the purpose of avoiding the danger to the passengers in the boat B, he is not guilty of an offence, though he may run down the boat C by doing an act which he knew was likely to cause that effect, if it be found as a matter of fact that the danger which he intended to avoid was such as to excuse him in incurring the risk of running down C.

(b) A, in a great fire, pulls down houses in order to prevent the conflagration from spreading. He does this with the intention in good faith of saving human life or property. Here, if it be found that the harm to be prevented was of such a nature and so imminent as to excuse A's act, A is not guilty of the offence.

COMMENT.

An act which would otherwise be a crime may in some cases be excused if the person accused can shew that it was done only in order to avoid consequences which could not otherwise be avoided, and which, if they had followed would have inflicted upon him or upon others whom he was bound to protect inevitable and irreparable evil, that no more was done than was reasonably necessary for that purpose, and that the evil inflicted by it was not disproportionate to the evil avoided.¹¹

Wherever necessity forces a man to do an illegal act, forces him to do it, it justifies him, because no man can be guilty of a crime without the will and intention of his mind. It must be voluntary. A man who is absolutely by natural necessity forced, his will does not go along with the act.¹²

1. 'Without any criminal intention.'—Under no circumstances can a person be justified in intentionally causing harm; if he causes the harm without any criminal intention, and merely with the knowledge that it is likely to ensue, he will not be held responsible for the result of his act, provided it be done in good faith to avoid or prevent other harm to person or property.

'Criminal intention' simply means the purpose or design of doing an act forbidden by the criminal law without just cause or excuse. An act is intentional if it exists in idea before it exists in fact, the idea realizing itself in the fact because of the desire by which it is accompanied. The word 'intent' does not mean ultimate aim and object. Nor is it used as a synonym for motive.¹³ Motive is not to be confused with intention. If a man knows that a certain consequence will follow from his act it must be presumed in law that he intended that consequence to take place although he may have had some quite different ulterior motive for performing the act.¹⁴ The motive for an act is not a sufficient test to determine its criminal character. By a motive is meant anything that can contribute to give birth to, or even to prevent, any kind of action. Motive may serve as a clue to the intention; but although the motive be pure, the act done under it may be criminal. Purity of motive will not purge an act of its criminal character.

Motive though not a sine qua non for bringing the offence home to the accused is relevant and important on the question of intention.¹⁵ Though the prosecution is not bound to prove motive for the crime, absence of any motive is a factor which may be considered in determining the guilt of the accused.¹⁶ But if the actual evidence as to the commission of the crime is believed, then no question of motive remains to be established.¹⁷ It is not the bounden duty of the prosecution to prove the motive with which a certain offence has been committed. It is sufficient if the prosecution prove by clear and reliable evidence that certain persons committed the offence, whatever the motives may be which induced them to commit that offence.¹⁸

Where the legislature makes an offence dependent on proof of intention, the Court must have proof of facts sufficient to justify it in coming to the conclusion that the intention existed. No doubt one has usually to infer intention from conduct, and one matter that has to be taken into account is the probable effect of the conduct. But that is never conclusive. The accused, a money lender, kept an account-book called vyaj-vahi, in which he made entries as to loans advanced by him, which entries were signed by the borrowers. None of these entries was stamped. The accused was prosecuted under s. 68(c) of the Indian Stamp Act, 1899. It was held that the accused was not guilty of the offence charged, because the Government had failed to prove any intent to defraud the Government of duty and that the Court would not infer a fraudulent intention merely because the result of the action of the parties would be to deprive the Government of duty.¹⁹ Intention is not capable of positive proof: it can only be implied from overt acts. As a general rule, every sane man is presumed to intend the necessary or the natural and probable consequences of his acts and this presumption of law will prevail unless from a consideration of all the evidence the Court entertains a reasonable doubt whether such intention existed. This presumption, however, is not conclusive nor alone sufficient to justify a conviction and should be supplemented by other testimony.²⁰ An accused must be judged to have the intention that is indicated by his proved acts.²¹

Under the Penal Code no man can be tried for any delusion or misconception of mind, however culpable and criminal such delusion or misconception may appear to be.²²

Mens rea.—It is one of the principles of the English criminal law that a crime is not committed if the mind of the person doing the act in question be innocent. It is said that actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea (the intent and act must both concur to constitute the crime). This principle has been discussed elaborately by Wills, J., in *Tolson's case*²³ in which the accused was convicted of bigamy, having gone through the ceremony of marriage within seven years, after she had been deserted by her husband. The jury found that at the time of the second marriage she in good faith and on reasonable grounds believed her husband to be dead. It was held by the majority of the Court that a bona fide belief on reasonable grounds in the death of the husband at the time of the second marriage afforded a good defence to the indictment, and that the conviction was wrong. Wills, J., observed: "The guilty intent is not necessarily that of intending the very act or thing done and prohibited by common or statute law, but it must at least be the intention to do something wrong. That intention may belong to one or other of two classes. It may be to do a thing wrong in itself and apart from positive law, or it may be to do a thing merely prohibited by statute or by common law, or both elements of intention may co-exist with respect to the same deed. There are many things prohibited by no statute—fornication or seduction, for instance—which nevertheless no one would hesitate to call wrong; and the intention to do an act wrong in this sense at the least must as a general rule exist before the act done can be considered a crime. Knowingly and intentionally to break a statute must, I think, from the judicial point of view, always be morally wrong in the absence of special circumstances applicable to the particular instance and excusing the breach of the law, as, for instance, if a municipal regulation be broken to save life or to put out a fire. But to make it morally right some such special matter of excuse must exist, inasmuch as the administration of justice and, indeed, the foundations of civil society rest upon the principle that obedience to the law, whether it be a law approved of or disapproved of by the individual, is the first duty of a citizen."

"Although prima facie and as a general rule there must be a mind at fault before there can be a crime, it is not an inflexible rule, and a statute may relate to such a subject-matter and may be so framed as to make an act criminal whether there has been any intention to break the law or otherwise to do wrong or not. There is a large body of municipal law in the present day which is so conceived. Bye-laws are constantly made regulating the width of thoroughfares, the height of buildings, the thickness of walls, and a variety of other matters necessary for the general welfare, health, or convenience, and such bye-laws are enforced by the sanction of penalties, and the breach of them constitutes an offence and is a criminal matter. In such cases it would, generally speaking, be no answer to proceedings for infringement of the bye-law that the person committing it had bona fide made an accidental miscalculation or an erroneous measurement. The Acts are properly construed as imposing the penalty when the act is done, no matter how innocently, and in such a case the substance of the enactment is that a man shall take care that the statutory direction is obeyed, and that if he fails to do so he does it at his peril.

"Whether an enactment is to be construed in this sense or with the qualification ordinarily imported into the construction of criminal statutes, that there must be a guilty mind, must, I think, depend upon the subject-matter of the enactment, and the various circumstances that may make the one construction or the other reasonable or unreasonable." But in the same case²⁴ Stephen, J., remarks that the phrase non est reus, nisi mens sit rea "Naturally suggests that, apart from all particular definitions of crimes, such a thing exists as a 'mens rea', or 'guilty mind', which is always expressly or by implication involved in every definition. This is obviously not the case, for the mental elements of different crimes differ widely. 'Mens rea' means in the case of murder, malice aforethought; in the case of theft, an intention to steal; in the case of rape, an intention to have forcible connection with a woman without her consent; and in the case of receiving stolen goods, knowledge that the goods were stolen. In some cases it denotes mere inattention. For instance, in the case of manslaughter by negligence it may mean forgetting to notice a signal. It appears confusing to call so many dissimilar states of mind by one name. It seems contradictory indeed to describe a mere absence of mind as a 'mens rea', or guilty mind. The expression again is likely to and often does mislead. To an unlegal mind it suggests that by the law of England no act is a crime which is done from laudable motives, in other words, that immorality is essential to crime..."

"The principle involved appears to me, when fully considered, to amount to no more than this. The full definition of every crime contains expressly or by implication a proposition as to a state of mind. Therefore, if the mental element of any conduct alleged to be a crime is proved to have been absent in any given case, the crime so defined is not committed; or, again, if a crime is fully defined, nothing amounts to that crime which does not satisfy that definition."

It, therefore, appears that the above maxim has not so wide an application as it is sometimes considered to have. It has undergone a modification owing to the greater precision of modern statutes. It is impossible to apply it generally to all statutes, and the substance of all the reported cases is that it is necessary to look at the object of each Act that is under consideration to see whether and how far knowledge is of the essence of the offence created. Crimes are at the present day much more accurately defined by statutes or otherwise than they formerly were.

But *Sherras v. De Rutzen*²⁵ seems very like an emphatic re-assertion of the doctrine that mens rea is an essential ingredient in every offence except in three cases:¹ (1) cases not criminal in any real sense but which in the public interest are prohibited under a penalty, e.g., Revenue Acts; (2) public nuisances; and (3) cases criminal in form but which are really only a summary mode of enforcing a civil right.

An intention to offend against the penal provisions of an Act constitutes mens rea. Sir Richard Couch, in delivering judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council,² observed: "It was strongly urged by the respondent's counsel that in order to the constitution of a crime, whether common law or statutory, there must be mens rea on the part of the accused, and that he may avoid conviction by shewing that such mens did not exist. That is a proposition which their Lordships do not desire to dispute; but the questions whether a particular intent is made an element of the statutory crime, and when that is not the case, whether there was an absence of mens rea in the accused, are questions entirely different, and depend upon different considerations. In cases when the statute requires a motive to be proved as an essential element of the crime, the prosecution must fail if it is not proved. On the other hand, the absence of mens rea really consists in an honest and reasonable belief entertained by the accused of the existence of facts which, if true, would make the act charged against him innocent." The words "a particular intent" meant all those states of mind, which a statute which creates an offence regards as necessary that an accused person should have, before he could be said to be guilty of the offence.³

The maxim actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea has, however, no application to the offences under the Code; because the definitions of various offences contain expressly a proposition as to the state of mind of the accused. The definitions state whether the act must have been done 'voluntarily', 'knowingly', 'dishonestly', or 'fraudulently' or the like. Every ingredient of the offence is stated in the definitions. So mens rea will mean one thing or another according to the particular offence. The guilty mind may thus be a fraudulent mind, or a dishonest mind, or a negligent or rash mind. Every offence under the Code virtually imports the idea of criminal intent or mens rea.⁴

In a criminal Court one often wants to test the alleged guilty mind by seeing what was the motive of the alleged criminal in doing the particular act. It is not essential, under the Code, for the prosecution to establish a motive. But as a matter of common sense, this is usually of importance, because an average man does not commit a criminal offence unless he has a strong motive for doing it.⁵

When guilty intent is the gist of an offence, evidence of similar acts to those charged at or about the same time as the latter is admissible to prove the intent.⁶

2. 'Good faith'.—See s. 52, supra.

3. 'Preventing harm to person or property'.—This is the case in which evil is done to prevent a greater evil. It is to this ground of justification that we must refer the extreme measures which may become necessary on occasions of contagious diseases, sieges, famines, tempests, shipwrecks. But the more serious a remedy of this nature is, the more evident ought its necessity to be. The welfare of the State has served as a pretext for all crimes. To give validity to this means of justification three essential points must be established: the certainty of the evil to be avoided, the absolute inapplicability of any means less costly, the certain efficacy of the means employed.⁷

Where a chief constable, not in his uniform, came to a fire and wished to force his way past the military sentries placed round it, was kicked by a sentry, it was held that, as the sentry did not know who he was, the kick was justifiable for the purpose of preventing much greater harm under this section and as a means of acting up to the military order. "The kick would be justified under s. 81... as given in good faith for the purpose of preventing much greater harm, the looting of the house or the spread of the fire, on the same principle that the man is excused by that section who in a great fire pulls down other peoples' houses to prevent the conflagration from spreading."⁸ Where a Magistrate arrested a drunken person whose conduct was at the time a grave danger to the public, it was held that the Magistrate was protected under this section or ss. 96 to 105.⁹ A person placed poison in his toddy pots, knowing that, if taken by a human being, it would cause injury but with the intention of thereby detecting an unknown thief who was in the habit of stealing the toddy from his pots. The toddy was drunk by, and caused injury to, some soldiers who purchased it from an unknown vendor. It was held that the person was rightly convicted of causing hurt by poison under s. 323, and that this section did not apply.¹⁰

Killing human being owing to starvation.—A man who, in order to escape death from hunger, kills another for the purpose of eating his flesh, is guilty of murder; although at the time of the act he is in such circumstances that he believes and has reasonable ground for believing that it affords the only chance of preserving his life. The accused D and S, sea-men, and the deceased, a boy between seventeen and eighteen, were cast away in a storm on the high seas, and compelled to put into an open boat. The boat was drifting on the ocean, and was probably more than 1,000 miles from land. On the eighteenth day, when they had been seven days without food and five without water D proposed to S that lots should be cast who should be put to death to save the rest and that they afterwards thought it would be better to kill the boy that their lives should be saved. On the twentieth day D, with the assent of S, killed the boy, and both D and S fed on his flesh for four days. At the time of the act there was no sail in sight nor any reasonable prospect of relief. Under those circumstances there appeared to the accused every probability that unless they then or very soon fed upon the boy or one of themselves they would die of starvation. It was held upon those facts, that there was no proof of any such necessity as could justify the prisoners in killing the boy, and that they were guilty of murder.¹¹ Lord Coleridge, C. J., said: "The temptation to the act which existed here was not what the law has ever called necessity. Nor is this to be regretted. Though law and morality are not the same, and many things may be immoral which are not necessarily illegal, yet the absolute divorce of law from morality would be of fatal consequence; and such divorce would follow if the temptation to murder in this case were to be held by law an absolute defence of it. It is not so. To preserve one's life is generally speaking a duty, but it may be the plainest and the highest duty to sacrifice it. War is full of instances in which it is a man's duty not to live, but to die. The duty, in case of shipwreck, of a captain to his crew, of the crew to the passengers, of soldiers to women and children, as in the noble case of the Birkenhead; these duties impose on men the moral necessity, not of the preservation, but of the sacrifice of their lives for others, from which in no country, least of all, it is to be hoped, in England, will men ever shrink, as indeed, they have not shrunk. It is not correct, therefore, to say that there is any absolute or unqualified necessity to preserve one's life. 'Necessessest ut eam, non ut vivam', is a saying of a Roman officer quoted by Lord Bacon himself with high eulogy in the very chapter on necessity to which so much reference has been made...it is not needful to point out the awful danger of admitting the principle which has been contended for. Who is to be the judge of this sort of necessity? By what measure is the comparative value of lives to be measured? Is it to be strength, or intellect, or what? It is plain that the principle leaves to him who is to profit by it to determine the necessity which will justify him in deliberately taking another's life to save his own. In this case the weakest, the youngest, the most unresisting, was chosen. Was it more necessary to kill him than one of the grown men? The answer must be 'No'—

'So spake the Fiend, and with necessity,

The tyrant's plea, excused his devilish deeds.'

It is not suggested that in this particular case the deeds were 'devilish', but it is quite plain that such a principle once admitted might be made the legal cloak for unbridled passion and atrocious crime...It must not be supposed that in refusing to admit temptation to be an excuse for crime it is forgotten how terrible the temptation was; how awful the suffering; how hard in such trials to keep the judgment straight and the conduct pure. We are often compelled to set up standards we cannot reach ourselves, and to lay down rules which we could not ourselves satisfy. But a man has no right to declare temptation to be an excuse, though he might himself have yielded to it, nor allow compassion for the criminal to change or weaken in any manner the legal definition of the crime."

A and B, swimming in the sea after a shipwreck, get hold of a plank not large enough to support both; A pushes off B, who is drowned. This, in the opinion of Sir James Stephen, is not a crime, as A thereby does B no direct bodily harm, but leaves him to his chance of another plank.

Doctrine of self-preservation.—The authors of the Code remark:—"We long considered whether it would be advisable to except from the operation of the penal accused committing it was starving: Nga Ywa, (1934) 12 Ran. 616.

clauses of the Code acts committed in good faith from the desire of self-preservation; and we have determined not to except them.

"We admit, indeed, that many acts falling under the definition of offences ought not to be punished when committed from the desire of self-preservation; and for this reason, that, as the Penal Code itself appeals solely to the fears of men, it never can furnish them with motives for braving dangers greater than the dangers with which it threatens them. Its utmost severity will be inefficacious for the purpose of preventing the mass of mankind from yielding to a certain amount of temptation. It can, indeed, make those who have yielded to the temptation miserable afterwards. But misery which has no tendency to prevent crime is so much clear evil. It is vain to rely on the dread of a remote and contingent evil as sufficient to overcome the dread of instant death, or the sense of actual torture. An eminently virtuous man indeed will prefer death to crime; but it is not to our virtue that the penal law addresses itself; nor would the world stand in need of penal laws if men were virtuous. A man who refuses to commit a bad action, when he sees preparations made for killing or torturing him unless he complies, is a man who does not require the fear of punishment to restrain him. A man, on the other hand, who is withheld from committing crimes solely or chiefly by the fear of punishment, will never be withheld by that fear when a pistol is held to his forehead or a lighted torch applied to his fingers for the purpose of forcing him to commit a crime.

"It would, we think, be mere useless cruelty to hang a man for voluntarily causing the death of others by jumping from a sinking ship into an overloaded boat. The suffering caused by the punishment is, considered by itself, an evil, and ought to be inflicted only for the sake of some preponderating good. But no preponderating good, indeed no good whatever, would be obtained by hanging a man for such an act. We cannot expect that the next man who feels the ship in which he is left descending into the waves, and sees a crowded boat putting off from it, will submit to instant and certain death from fear of a remote and contingent death. There are men, indeed, who in such circumstances would sacrifice their own lives rather than risk the lives of others. But such men act from the influence of principles and feelings which no penal laws can produce, and which if they were general, would render penal law unnecessary. Again, a gang of dacoits, finding a house strongly secured, seize a smith, and by torture and threats of death induce him to take his tools and to force the door for them; here, it appears to us, that to punish the smith as a house-breaker would be to inflict gratuitous pain; we cannot trust to the deterring effect of such punishment. The next smith who may find himself in the same situation will rather take his chance of being, at a distant time, arrested, convicted and sentenced to imprisonment, than incur certain and immediate death.

"In the cases which we have put, some persons may perhaps doubt whether there ought to be impunity; but those very persons would generally admit that the extreme danger was a mitigating circumstance to be considered in apportioning the punishment. It might, however, with no small plausibility be contended that if any punishment at all is inflicted in such cases, that punishment ought to be not merely death, but death with torture; for the dread of being put to death by torture might possibly be sufficient to prevent a man from saving his own life by a crime; but it is quite certain, as we have said, that the mere fear of capital punishment which is remote, and which may never be inflicted at all, will never prevent him from saving his life. And a fortiori, the dread of a milder punishment will not prevent him from saving his life. Laws directed against offences to which men are prompted by cupidity, ought always to take from offenders more than those offenders expect to gain by crime. It would obviously be absurd to provide that a thief or a swindler should be punished with a fine not exceeding half the sum which he had acquired by theft or swindling; in the same manner, laws directed against offences to which men are prompted by fear ought always to be framed in such a way as to be more terrible than the dangers which they require men to brave. It is on this ground, we apprehend, that a soldier who runs away in action is punished with a rigour altogether unproportioned to the moral depravity which his offence indicates. Such a soldier may be an honest and benevolent man, and irreproachable in all the relations of civil life; yet he is punished as severely as a deliberate assassin, and more severely than a robber or a kidnapper. Why is this? Evidently because, as his offence arises from fear, it must be punished in such a manner that timid men may dread the punishment more than they dread the fire of the enemy.

"If all cases in which acts falling under the definition of offences are done from the desire of self-preservation were as clear as the cases which we have put of the man who jumps from a sinking ship into a boat, and of the smith who is compelled by dacoits to force a door for them, we should, without hesitation, propose to exempt this class of acts from punishment. But it is to be observed, that in both these cases the person in danger is supposed to have been brought into danger, without the smallest fault on his own part, by mere accident, or by the depravity of others. If a captain of a merchantman were to run his ship on shore in order to cheat the insurers, and then to sacrifice the lives of others in order to save himself from a danger created by his own villainy; if a person who had joined himself to a gang of dacoits with no other intention than that of robbing were at the command of his leader, accompanied with threats of instant death in case of disobedience, to commit murder, though unwillingly, the case would be widely different, and our former reasoning would cease to apply; for it is evident that punishment which is inefficacious to prevent a man from yielding to a certain temptation may often be efficacious to prevent him from exposing himself to that temptation. We cannot count on the fear which a man may entertain of being brought to the gallows at some distant time as sufficient to overcome the fear of instant death; but the fear of remote punishment may often overcome the motives which induce a man to league himself with lawless companions, in whose society no person who shrinks from any atrocity that they may command can be certain of his life. Nothing is more usual than for pirates, gang-robbers and rioters to excuse their crimes by declaring that they were in dread of their associates, and durst not act otherwise. Nor is it by any means improbable that this may often be true. Nay, it is not improbable that crews of pirates and gangs of robbers may have committed crimes which every one among them was unwilling to commit, under the influence of mutual fear; but we think it clear that this circumstance ought not to exempt them from the full severity of the law.

"Again, nothing is more usual than for thieves to urge distress and hunger as excuses for their thefts. It is certain, indeed, that many thefts are committed from the pressure of distress so severe as to be more terrible than the punishment of theft, and than the disgrace which that punishment brings with it to the mass of mankind. It is equally certain that, when the distress from which a man can relieve himself by theft is more terrible than the evil consequences of theft, those consequences will not keep him from committing theft; yet it by no means follows that it is irrational to punish him for theft; for though the fear of punishment is not likely to keep any man from theft when he is actually starving, it is very likely to keep him from being in a starving state. It is of no effect to counteract the irresistible motive which immediately prompts to theft; but it is of great effect to counteract the motives to that idleness and that profusion which end in bringing a man into a condition in which no law will keep him from committing theft. We can hardly conceive a law more injurious to society than one which would provide that as soon as a man who has neglected his work, or who had squandered his wages in stimulating drugs, or gambled them away, had been thirty-six hours without food, and felt the sharp impulse of hunger, he might, with impunity, steal food from his neighbours.

"We should, therefore, think it in the highest degree pernicious to enact that no act done under the fear even of instant death should be an offence. It would a fortiori be absurd to enact that no act under the fear of any other evil should be an offence.

"There are, as we have said, cases in which it would be useless cruelty to punish acts done under the fear of death, or even of evils less than death. But it appears to us impossible precisely to define these cases. We have, therefore, left them to the Government, which, in the exercise of its clemency, will doubtless be guided in a great measure by the advice of the Courts."¹²

But in their first Report the Commissioners say: "We think that a distinction may be drawn between cases in which a man does a thing which is an offence by law, spontaneously, to save his own life, and cases in which he does such a thing, from what is called duress, that is from the compulsion of others to save his life threatened by them.

"With respect to the former, we agree with the authors of the Code that it is impossible to define precisely those cases in which it may be proper to excuse the parties, and that it is expedient to leave them to the discretion of the Government."¹³

They then proposed s. 54 to meet the latter kind of cases.

As to the doctrine of compulsion and necessity, see Comment under s. 94, infra.

Act of a child under seven years of age.

82. Nothing is an offence which is done by a child under seven years of age.

COMMENT.

Under the age of seven years no infant can be guilty of a crime; for, under that age an infant is, by presumption of law, doli incapax, and cannot be endowed with any discretion.¹⁴ He cannot distinguish right from wrong. If the accused were a child under seven years of age, the proof of that fact would be ipso facto an answer to the prosecution.¹⁵ See ante, s. 6, ill. (a) Accused purchased for one-anna, from a child aged six years, two pieces of cloth valued at fifteen annas, which the child had taken from the house of a third person. It was held that, assuming that a charge of an offence under s. 411 could not be sustained, the accused was clearly guilty of criminal misappropriation, if he knew that the property belonged to the child's guardian and dishonestly appropriated it to his own use.¹⁶ The defendant caught a child in the act of stealing a piece of wood from his premises, and gave it into custody. The child was discharged by the Magistrate on the ground that it was under the age of responsibility. Erle, C. J., said that an infant under seven years of age could not incur the guilt of felony.¹⁷

The immunity of children under seven years of age from criminal liability is not confined to offences under the Code only, but extends to offences under any special or local law in virtue of s. 40. A child under seven years of age, who was the registered owner of a hired motor-vehicle—there being no law in Burma against children, however, young, being registered owners of motor-vehicles—was held not liable for the offence of plying a bus for hire without a licence.¹⁸ But if a particular Act has special provisions to the contrary a child will be liable. See, for instance, the Indian Railways Act¹⁹ as to offences committed by children against certain provisions of that Act.

Where an Ordinance makes members of a partnership or co-parceners of a joint family firm liable for the criminal act of their servant in contravention of the Ordinance, the case of minor co-parceners will be governed by ss. 82 and 83 of the Code.²⁰

COMMENT.

In construing this section the capacity of doing that which is wrong is not so much to be measured by years, as by the strength of the offender's understanding and judgment. The circumstances of a case may disclose such a degree of malice as to justify the maxim malitia supplet aetatem.²¹

1. 'Under twelve'.—With reference to the precocity of children in the East, the rule of the Indian Code which fixes the age of twelve as the period after which the plea of immaturity of understanding shall not be allowed, appears to be proper.²²

where the child has not attained sufficient maturity, etc., and such non-attainment would have apparently to be specially pleaded and proved, like the incapacity of a person who, at the time of doing an act charged as an offence, was alleged to have been of unsound mind. 3. 'Consequences of his conduct.'—"It is not apparently the penal consequences to the offender that are referred to, but the natural consequences which flow from a voluntary act, such for instance as that, when fire is applied to an inflammable substance, it will burn, or that a heavy blow with an axe or a sword will cause death or grievous hurt."²⁵

Theft by child.—Where, a child of nine years of age stole a necklace, worth Rs. 2-8, and immediately afterwards sold it to the accused for five annas, the child was discharged under this section, but the accused was convicted because the act of the child, though under twelve years of age, showed that he had attained sufficient maturity of understanding to judge of the nature and consequences of his conduct, and that the act of the child was therefore theft, and that the accused was rightly convicted of receiving stolen property.¹

Bigamy by child of ten years.—Where a child of ten years married again during the life-time of her husband, the marriage being negotiated and caused to be performed by her mother, the child was held not to have attained sufficient maturity of understanding to judge of the nature and consequences of her conduct on the occasion of the second marriage.²

Murder of girl of ten years.—The accused who was about ten years of age slept with her mother-in-law the night before the murder. Her husband aged about nineteen slept with his brother in another hut in the same homestead. In the early morning the mother-in-law woke up the accused, and told her to go about her household duties. Shortly after this the accused was seen running out of the house and her husband was found mortally wounded on the neck. She hid herself in a field and was not found until the afternoon. It was held that she was doli capax and that the Court could infer from the circumstances of the case such a degree of malice as to justify the application of the maxim malitia supplet cetatum.³

English law.—According to English law an infant between the age of seven and fourteen years is presumed to be doli incapax. If a child more than seven and under fourteen years of age is indicated for felony, it will be left to the jury to say whether the offence was committed by the accused, and, if so, whether at the time of the offence, the accused had a guilty knowledge that he was doing wrong.⁴ In cases of murder if it appear to the Court and jury that the infant was doli capax, and could discern between good and evil when the offence was committed, he may be convicted of the capital offence and executed.⁵ But an infant under fourteen, if indicted for murder, must be proved conscious of the nature of the act.⁶

Infants above fourteen and under twenty-one are subject to all kinds of punishments; for it is presumptio juris that after fourteen years they are doli capaces, and can discern between good and evil.⁷

English cases.—A boy of eight was hanged in 1629 for burning two barns as it appeared that he had malice, revenge, craft, and cunning.⁸ Where a boy of ten killed his play-fellow, the fact that he hid the body away was held sufficient to rebut the presumption of doli incapax and he was hanged. So a girl of thirteen was burnt for killing her mistress.⁹ Where an infant of nine years of age killed an infant of the like age and hid both the blood and the body, and afterwards confessed the crime, it was held that he might lawfully be hanged but pardon was asked for.¹⁰ Similarly, where a boy of ten years of age murdered a girl of about five years of age, under circumstances of "mischievous discretion", he was sentenced to death, though he was afterwards pardoned by the King upon condition of his entering immediately into the sea-service. The Judges unanimously laid down: "There are many crimes of the most heinous nature, such as in the present case the murder of young children, poisoning parents or masters, burning houses, etc., which children are very capable of committing; and which they may in some circumstances be under strong temptations to commit; and therefore, though the taking away of life of a boy of ten years old may savour of cruelty, yet as the example of this boy's punishment may be a means of deterring other children from the like offences; and as the sparing this boy, merely on account of his age, will probably have a quite contrary tendency, in justice to the public, the law ought to take its course; unless there remaineth any doubt touching his guilt."¹¹ A confession made by a boy under fourteen years of age, who had committed murder, was held to be admissible against him.¹²

Rape.—The rule at common law is that in regard to the offence of rape malitia non supplet cetatum: a boy under fourteen is under a physical incapacity to commit the offence. That is a presumptio juris et de jure, and Judges have time after time refused to receive evidence to show that a particular accused was in fact capable of committing the offence. The Criminal Law Amendment Act¹³ has not altered the common law principle.¹⁴ Nor can a boy under fourteen be convicted of an assault with intent to commit a rape,¹⁵ or of feloniously carnally knowing and abusing a girl under ten years of age.¹⁶ But he can be guilty as a principal in the second degree¹⁷ or may be convicted of an indecent assault.¹⁸ This presumption of English law has no application to India.¹⁹ A boy of twelve can be convicted of attempt to commit rape.²⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—It is not that a Magistrate is under no circumstances competent to find from the appearance of a person convicted by him that he is a youthful offender, but it is generally desirable that there should be some reliable evidence on the point, and especially when it is necessary to determine the period of detention. Where the age of the accused is under twelve years, the Magistrate should, considering the provisions of this section, find that he has attained sufficient maturity of understanding to judge of the nature and consequences of his act.²¹

An objection that the accused is of such an age as not to have attained sufficient maturity of understanding to judge of the nature and consequences of his conduct, is not one of a preliminary character, but rather a matter of defence to be considered with the other issues arising in the case.²²

Where a child under twelve years of age commits an offence when he is unable to understand the nature of the offence, he cannot be debarred under s. 105 of the Indian Evidence Act from the defence allowed him by this section because of his ignorance of Court procedure.²³

Punishment.—Sentences of death, transportation, or imprisonment cannot be passed on a child or young person.²⁴ The parent may be ordered to pay fine instead of the child or young person.²⁵

84. Nothing is an offence which is done by a person who, at the time of doing it,¹ by reason of unsoundness of mind,² is incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is either wrong or contrary to law.³

COMMENT.

The policy of the law is to control not only the sane, but so far as is possible, also the insane. It is not, therefore, every person mentally diseased who, ipso facto, is exempted from criminal responsibility. Such exemption is allowed only where the insane person "is incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is either wrong or contrary to law." This section lays down the legal test of responsibility in cases of alleged unsoundness of mind. It is by this test, as distinguished from the medical test, that the criminality of an act is to be determined.¹ This provision of our law is in substance the same as that laid down in the answers of the Judges to the questions put to them by the House of Lords in M'Naghton's case.²

This section provides that a man who is, by reason of unsoundness of mind, prevented from controlling his own conduct and deprived of the power of passing a rational judgment on the moral character of the act he meant to do cannot be legally responsible for the act. If a man suffers under a partial delusion only and is sane in other respects he must be dealt with as if the facts with respect to which the delusion existed were real.³

A man who by reason of mental disease is prevented from controlling his own conduct, and a man who is deprived, by disease affecting the mind, of the power of passing a rational judgment on the moral character of the act he meant to do, is entitled to the benefit of this section.⁴ A human creature deprived of reason, and disordered in his senses, is still an animal, or instrument possessing strength and ability to commit violence; but he is no more so than a mere mechanical machine which, when put in motion, performs its powerful operations on all that comes in its way, without consciousness of its own effect, or responsibility for them. In like manner, the man under the influence of real madness has properly no will, but does what he is not conscious or sensible of doing and therefore cannot be made answerable for any consequences.⁵

Under this section an accused is protected not only when, on account of insanity, he was incapable of knowing the nature of the act, but also when he did not know either that the act was wrong or that it was contrary to law, although he might know the nature of the act itself. He is, however, not protected if he knew that what he was doing was wrong, even if he did not know that it was contrary to law, and also if he knew that what he was doing was contrary to law even though he did not know that it was wrong.⁶

There are four kinds of persons who may be said to be non compos mentes (not of sound mind): (1) an idiot; (2) one made non compos by illness; (3) a lunatic or madman; and (4) one who is drunk.

(1) An idiot is one who is of non-sane memory from his birth, by a perpetual infirmity, without lucid intervals... and those are said to be idiots who cannot count twenty, or tell the days of the week, who do not know their fathers or mothers, or the like... A person deaf and dumb from his birth, who has no means of learning to discriminate between right and wrong, or of understanding the penal enactments of the law, as applicable to particular offences, is an idiot; but if it can be shown that he has the use of understanding, which many of that condition discover by signs, then he may be tried, convicted, and punished, although great caution should be observed in such proceedings.⁷

The word 'idiot' has not been defined in any Indian Act, but undoubtedly idiocy is a form of congenital insanity, due to the absence of development of the mental faculties and intelligence from very childhood. The only standard and test of insanity laid down by the law is, according to this section, whether the person was by reason of unsoundness of mind incapable of knowing the nature and quality of the act, or that the act was wrong or contrary to law. In England the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, defines idiots as being persons so deeply defective in mind from birth, or from an early age, as to be unable to guard themselves against common physical dangers, and it distinguishes idiots as being a more aggravated type of defectives than imbeciles or feeble-minded persons. This definition and distinction, although not absolutely binding in India, furnish a good guide to the Courts in India. Further, although there has always been a difference between the points of view of a medical man and a lawyer on the question of insanity, the former tending to include any form of abnormality in the term insanity, the classification and distinction contained in the English Act regarding idiots, imbeciles and merely feeble-minded persons is in perfect accord with medical books of high authority, which define idiocy as dementia naturalis or complete amentia, and imbecility as partial amentia. It is, therefore, clear that in order to find that a person is an idiot it is not sufficient to find that he is a mere imbecile; one cannot be an idiot unless his faculties have not all been developed and he has not acquired any appreciable intelligence.⁸

(2) A person made non compos mentis by illness is excused in criminal cases from such acts as are committed while under the influence of his disorder.⁹ Several causes have been assigned for this disorder; sometimes from the distemper of the humours of the body; sometimes from the violence of a disease, as a fever or palsy; sometimes from a concussion or hurt of the brain; and, as it is more or less violent, it is distinguishable in kind or degree, from a particular dementia in respect of some particular matters, to a total alienation of the mind, or complete madness.¹⁰

(3) A lunatic is one who is "afflicted by mental disorder only at certain periods and vicissitudes; having intervals of reason. Such persons during their frenzy are criminally as irresponsible as those whose disorder is fixed and permanent".¹¹

That in the species of madness called lunacy, where persons are subject to temporary paroxysms in which they are guilty of acts of extravagance, such persons committing crimes when they are not affected by the malady would be to all intents and purposes amenable to justice; and that so long as they could distinguish good from evil they would be answerable for their conduct. And that in the species of insanity in which the patient fancies the existence of injury, and seeks an opportunity of gratifying revenge by some hostile act, if such person be capable in other respects of distinguishing right from wrong, there would be no excuse for any act of atrocity which he might commit under this description of derangement.¹²

Madness is permanent. Lunacy and madness are spoken of as acquired insanity, and idiocy as natural insanity.

(4) As to persons who are drunk, see s. 85, infra.

1. 'At the time of doing it'.—To establish a defence on the ground of insanity it must clearly be proved that at the time of the committing of the act, the party accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong.¹³ If he did know it, he was responsible.¹⁴ The mere fact that on former occasions the accused had been occasionally subject to insane delusions or had suffered from derangement of the mind, or that subsequently he had at times behaved like a mentally deficient person is per se insufficient to bring his case within the exemption.¹⁵ The antecedent and subsequent conduct of the man are relevant only to show what the state of his mind at the time the act was committed. The Court is only concerned with the state of mind of the accused at the time of the act.¹⁶ A plea of insanity at the time of trial will not avail the accused.¹⁷ In such a case he will be tried in accordance with the special procedure laid down in the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The fact that the accused has had an attack of insanity before the occurrence of the criminal act and another one in jail during the period between the enquiry in the committing Magistrate's Court, and the opening of the trial in the Sessions Court, does not mean that the accused committed the act in a fit of insanity and the accused cannot be entitled to the benefit of this section merely on that ground.¹⁸

2. 'Unsoundness of mind'.—Whether the want of capacity is temporary or permanent, natural or supervening, whether it arises from disease, or exists from the time of birth, it is included in this expression. Thus an idiot who is a person without understanding from his birth, a lunatic who has intervals of reasons, and a person who is mad or delirious, are all persons of "unsound mind". There are numerous degrees of insanity. It has been said that not every little cloud floating over an otherwise enlightened understanding will exempt from criminal responsibility; nor on the other hand, will every glimmering of reason over the darkness of a troubled mind subject the unfortunate being to the heavy pains provided for wilful wrong-doing. According to the Code, unsoundness of mind, to make a man irresponsible, must reach that degree which is described in the latter part of this exception. It is not every person suffering from mental disease that can avoid responsibility for a crime by invoking the plea of insanity. There is a distinction between a "medical insanity" and "legal insanity" and the Courts are only concerned with the legal and not with the medical view of the question.¹⁹

If a person is found unsound mind, he is to be judged by the ordinary rules in regard to insanity, no matter whether the insanity arose from disease of the brain or from persistent indulgence in intoxicating drugs or liquor.²⁰

An idiot or lunatic, even if he is conscious of his act, has no capacity to know its nature and quality, and is therefore not responsible. Mad men, especially those under the influence of some delusion, may have capacity enough to know the nature of the act, but unless they also know that they are doing "what is either wrong or contrary to law", they are not responsible. A common instance is, where a man fully believes that the act he is doing, e.g., killing another man, is done by the immediate command of God.²¹

"It is only unsoundness of mind which materially impairs the cognitive faculties of the mind that can form a ground of exemption from criminal responsibility, the nature and the extent of the unsoundness of mind required being such as would make the offender incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is wrong or contrary to law... A person strikes another, and in consequence of an insane delusion thinks he is breaking a jar. Here he does not know the nature of the act. Or he may kill a child under an insane delusion that he is saving him from sin and sending him to heaven. Here he is incapable of knowing by reason of insanity that he is doing what is morally wrong. Or he may under insane delusion believe an innocent man whom he kills to be a man, that was going to take his life; in which case, by reason of his insane delusion, he is incapable of knowing that he is doing what is contrary to the law of the land".²² A person whose cognitive faculties are not so impaired as to make it impossible for him to know the nature of his act or that he was doing what was wrong or contrary to law is not exempted from criminal responsibility.²³ Mere subjection to insane impulses is not sufficient.²⁴ There are some forms of unsoundness of mind which seem to affect only particular acts. The unsoundness of mind may be such that in respect of certain acts the person committing them is incapable of knowing the nature of what he is doing, while in the case of other acts he might have knowledge of their character.²⁵

It is not every kind of frantic humour of something unaccountable in a man's actions that points him out to be such a mad man as is to be exempted from punishment: it must be a man that is totally deprived of his understanding and memory, and doth not know what he is doing, no more than an infant, than a brute, or a wild beast such as one is never the object of punishment.¹ A person cannot be said to be insane where all that is established is that he was moody, irritable and conceited and may be said to have been peculiar but at no time did he suffer from insanity of such nature or degree as to preclude him from knowing the nature of his acts or to obscure the distinction between right and wrong.² Want of any motive for the doing of an act cannot be taken as evidence of maniacal tendency.³

Partial delusion.—Whether a person who, under an insane delusion as to the existing facts, commits an offence in consequence thereof, is to be therefore excused depends upon the nature of the delusion. If he labours under a partial delusion only, and is not in other respects insane, he must be considered in the same situation as to responsibility as if the facts, with respect to which the delusion exists, were real. For example, if under the influence of his delusion, a person supposes another man to be in the act of attempting to take away his life, and he kills that man as he supposes in self-defence, he would be exempt from punishment. If his delusion was that the deceased had inflicted a serious injury to his character and fortune, and killed him in revenge for such supposed injury, he would be liable to punishment.⁴ If a person afflicted with an insane delusion, in respect of one or more particular subjects or persons, commits a crime, knowing that he was acting contrary to law, but did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of an insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some public benefit, he is nevertheless punishable according to the nature of the crime committed.⁵

Moral insanity.—This is a form of insanity when a man's intellectual faculties are sound, but his moral sense is affected or diseased. The functions of the mind are of a twofold nature—those of the intellect, or faculty of thought, such as perception or judgment; and, those of the moral sentiments and affections, the propensities and the passion; and the latter may be diseased while the intellectual faculties are sound.⁶ "We learn, however, . . . that insanity affects not only the cognitive faculties of the mind which guide our actions, but also our emotions which prompt our actions, and the will by which our actions are performed. It may be that our law, like the law of England, limits non-liability only to those cases in which insanity affects the cognitive faculties; because it is thought that those are the cases to which the exemption rightly applies, and the cases, in which insanity affects only the emotions and the will, subjecting the offender to impulses, whilst it leaves the cognitive faculties unimpaired, have been left outside the exception, because it has been thought that the object of the criminal law is to make people control their insane as well as their sane impulses . . . we are not prepared to accept the view as generally correct that a person is entitled to exemption from criminal liability under our law in cases in which it is only shown that he is subject to insane impulses, notwithstanding that it may appear clear that his cognitive faculties, so far as we can judge from his acts and words, are left unimpaired".⁷

The delusions which indicate a defect of sanity such as will relieve a person from criminal responsibility, are delusions of the senses, or such as relate to facts or objects—not mere wrong notions, or impressions, of a moral nature; and the aberration must be mental, not moral, to affect the intellect of the individual. It is not enough that they show a deceased or depraved state of mind, or an aberration of the moral feelings; the sense of right and wrong being still, although it may be perverted, yet not destroyed. And the theory of a moral insanity, or insanity of the moral feelings, while the sense of right and wrong remains, is not to be reconciled with the legal doctrine on the subject.⁸ The circumstance of the accused having acted under an irresistible influence to the commission of an offence is no defence if at the time he committed the act he knew he was doing what was wrong. If "an influence be so powerful as to be termed irresistible, so much the more reason is there why we should not withdraw any of the safeguards tending to counteract it. There are three powerful restraints existing, all tending to the assistance of the person who is suffering under such an influence—the restraint of religion, the restraint of conscience, and the restraint of law. But if the influence itself be held a legal excuse, rendering the crime punishable, you at once withdraw a most powerful restraint—that forbidding and punishing its perpetration".⁹

The circumstance of an act being apparently motiveless is not a ground from which the existence of an irresistible influence can be inferred. Motives exist unknown and innumerable which might prompt the act. A morbid and restless (but resistible) thirst for blood would itself be a motive urging to such a deed for its own relief.¹⁰ It is dangerous ground to take to say that a man must be insane because men fail to discern the motive for his act.¹¹ Where it was proved that the accused had committed multiple murders while suffering from mental derangement of some sort and it was found that there was (i) absence of any motive, (ii) absence of secrecy, (iii) want of pre-arrangement, and (iv) want of accomplices, it was held that the circumstances were sufficient to support the inference that the accused suffered from unsoundness of mind.¹²

Insanity brought on by drunkenness.—The House of Lords have laid down after a review of English cases bearing on the subject that insanity, whether produced by drunkenness or otherwise, is a defence to the crime charged only under certain circumstances. Evidence of drunkenness which renders the accused incapable of forming the specific intent essential to constitute the crime ought to be taken into consideration, with the other facts proved, in order to determine whether he had that intent. In this case the accused ravished a girl of thirteen years of age and in furtherance of the act of rape placed his hand upon her mouth and his thumb upon her throat, thereby causing death by suffocation. The sole defence was a plea of drunkenness. It was held that drunkenness was no defence unless it could be established that the accused at the time of committing rape was so drunk that he was incapable of forming the intent to commit it (which was not alleged), inasmuch as the death resulted from a succession of acts, the rape and the act of violence causing suffocation, which could not be regarded independently of each other; and that the accused was guilty of murder.¹³ Evidence of drunkenness falling short of a proved incapacity in the accused to form the intent necessary to constitute the crime and merely establishing that his mind was affected by the drink so that he more readily gave way to some violent passion, does not rebut the presumption that a man intends the natural consequences of his acts.¹⁴

Drunkenness is no excuse, but delirium tremens caused by drinking, and differing from drunkenness, if it produces such a degree of madness, even for a time, as to render a person incapable of distinguishing right from wrong, relieves him from criminal responsibility.¹⁵ If voluntary drunkenness has caused a disease which has produced such incapacity as is mentioned in this section then the act will be excused, though the disease may be of a temporary nature.¹⁶ The accused while proceeding towards this field met a boy who was returning home, and without speaking a word he killed the boy with a single stroke of a club as he passed and then made off across a field. The blow dealt was unpremeditated, there being no quarrel or dispute of any kind. The evidence showed that the accused was addicted to intemperate habits by excessive use of opium, and that for some days before and after killing the boy the accused was irresponsible for his actions. It was held that the accused was incapable of knowing the nature of his act or that he was doing what was either wrong or contrary to law.¹⁷ The accused after partaking of intoxicating liquor walked two miles in the sun to a village where he was hit on the head by another person. He pursued that person to a certain house, but not finding him there he attacked and wounded with a club five women who were in the house. The Civil Surgeon thought that the accused was not fully responsible for his actions owing to the mental state caused by the wound on his head, the alcohol he had taken, and the walk in the sun. It was held that the facts were not sufficient to bring the case within the provisions of this section. The term 'unsoundness of mind' cannot be construed so widely as to cover the loss of self-control following a hostile blow on the head. The assault on the women was the outcome of disappointed rage.¹⁸

Homicidal mania.—Homicidal maniacs need have no motive to perpetrate crime.¹⁹ But because a murder is committed without a motive, irresistible influence of homicidal tendency cannot be inferred.²⁰ Where a husband who has never been known to have ill-treated his wife assaults his wife which results in her death, it cannot be said, from the mere fact that there was an absence of a deep-seated motive, that the husband must have been insane.²¹

As to the mental disease known as hebephrenia which leads one to commit murderous assaults without motive see Onkar Datt Nigam's case.²²

Impulsive insanity.—It is said that on particular occasions men are seized with irrational and irresistible impulses to kill, to steal, or to burn, and that under the influence of such impulses they sometimes commit acts which would otherwise be most atrocious crimes...It would be absurd to deny the possibility that such impulses may occur, or the fact that they have occurred, and have been acted on. Instances are also given in which the impulse was felt and was resisted. The only question which the existence of such impulses can raise in the administration of criminal justice is, whether the particular impulse...was (really) irresistible as well as unresisted. If it were irresistible, the person accused is entitled to be acquitted, because the act was not voluntary and was not properly his act. If the impulse was resistible, the fact that it proceeded from disease is no excuse at all. If a man's nerves were so irritated by a baby's crying that he instantly killed it, his act would be murder. It would not be less murder if the same irritation and the corresponding desire were produced by some internal disease. The great object of the criminal law is to induce people to control their impulses, and there is no reason why, if they can, they should not control insane impulses as well as sane ones. The proof that an impulse was irresistible depends principally on the circumstances of the particular case. The commonest, and probably the strongest cases, are those of women, who without motive or concealment, kill their children after recovery from childbed.²³

Where an act of murder is committed without motive and apparently on some kind of sudden impulse, it cannot fall within this section by reason of the accused not having known the nature of the act or that it is wrong or contrary to law. The mere fact that an act of this character is committed on a sudden impulse with no discoverable motive will not, in general, afford sufficient basis for accepting a plea of insanity.²⁴

3. 'Nature of the act or...what is either wrong or contrary to law.'

The question in each case must be, whether the accused person was in a state to know the nature of the act and its criminal character as against the law of the land. That is, it must be ascertained whether he was conscious of doing what he ought not to do. If the accused were conscious that the act was one which he ought not to do, and if the act was at the same time contrary to the law of the land, he is punishable. His liability will not be diminished if he did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some public benefit, if he knew that he was acting contrary to law.²⁵ A person may be both insane and responsible for his actions.¹ Where a man deliberately murdered his wife under the belief that she was haunted by evil spirits, and that if he killed her evil spirits would leave her, he was held guilty of murder.² Where the accused alleged that she had committed murder by reason of being possessed by evil spirit and in pursuance of its bidding, on pain of herself being killed by that spirit, it was held that she was guilty of murder.³ The accused was anxious to get the deceased in his service as a cow-herd but the deceased's father refused to let him undertake the duty. Thereupon the accused one day caught hold of the deceased, fell him to the ground and beat him on the head with stones till he died. The accused then ran away and was seen cleaning his blood-stained hands with sand in the river. He subsequently hid himself in his cottage and attempted to prevent people coming in by placing stones against the door. After his arrest he was certified insane and committed to a Mental Hospital. After he was discharged as cured he stood his trial. It was held that the accused was not insane within the meaning of this section as in killing the deceased he knew that he was doing something wrong and that it did not matter how insane he might be from the medical point of view.⁴

A man may be suffering from some form of insanity in the sense in which the words would be used by an alienist but may not be suffering from unsoundness of mind as defined in this section. The law recognizes nothing but incapacity to realize the nature of the act and presumes that where a man's mind or his faculties of ratiocination are sufficiently clear to apprehend what he is doing, he must always be presumed to intend the consequences of the action he takes. Where, therefore, the accused, after killing four persons in rapid succession with a gandasa, dropped it and began to run away, and subsequently volunteered information concerning the death of one of the deceased and there were no accomplices nor any evidence of motive, secrecy or pre-arrangement on the part of the accused, it was held that he was rightly convicted of murder.⁵

The inquiry must be directed to the particular thing done and not to any other, because a man may be responsible for some things, and not for others. Thus everything depends on the attitude of the prisoner's mind with regard to the particular act charged against him. If it was a guilty mind with regard to that act, its general derangement will not be an excuse. Thus, in the case of Lord Ferrers, who was tried before the House of Lords for the murder of his steward, it was shown that he was occasionally insane, and incapable from his insanity of knowing what he did, or judging of the consequences of his actions, but as it appeared that the murder was deliberate and the Earl knew what he was doing, he was executed.⁶

Any disease which so disturbs the mind that you cannot think calmly and rationally of all the different reasons to which we refer in considering the rightness or wrongness of an action—any disease which so disturbs the mind that you cannot perform that duty with some moderate degree of calmness and reason may be fairly said to prevent a man from knowing that what he did was wrong.⁷

Where a person, otherwise sane but labouring under the influence of an insane delusion, commits an act of revenge for some supposed grievance or injury, he is nevertheless punishable according to the nature of the crime committed if at the time he understood that he was committing a wrong and unlawful act. In other words, he must be considered in the same situation as to responsibility as a sane person would be if the facts with regard to which the delusion exists were true.⁸ A person who is in a highly excited and unbalanced condition, but is nevertheless conscious that what he is doing is wrong and a crime, cannot be said to be of unsound mind within the meaning of this section.⁹ Where all that is proved is that a person who has committed a murder is conceited, odd, irascible and that his brain is not quite all right, it is insufficient to establish that the accused was incapable of knowing that what he was doing was wrong, and the provisions of this section are not applicable to his case.¹⁰

There is a clear difference between medical insanity and legal insanity. It is only legal insanity which furnishes a ground for exemption from criminal responsibility. There can be no legal insanity unless the cognitive faculties of the accused are, as a result of unsoundness of mind, completely impaired. In order to constitute legal insanity the unsoundness of mind must be such as should make the offender incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that he is doing what is wrong or contrary to law.¹¹

Unsoundness of mind need not necessarily make a person incapable of understanding the nature of all his acts. There are some forms of unsoundness of mind which seem to affect only particular acts. In other words, unsoundness of mind may be such that in respect of certain acts the person committing them is incapable of knowing the nature of what he is doing while in the case of other acts he might have knowledge of their character.¹²

Homicide by person suffering from fever.—Where an accused, who was suffering from fever which caused him while suffering from its paroxysms to be bewildered and unconscious, killed his children at being annoyed at their crying, but he was not delirious then, and there was no evidence to show that he was not conscious of the nature of his act, it was held that he could not be entitled to protection under this section.¹³ The accused stabbed a child (his brother's wife) with a sword and killed her. No motive could be assigned for his attack on the child, and it appeared that he had been in the habit of treating the child kindly and affectionately. He was suffering from fever and want of food at the time, and the medical evidence showed it was possible that the act was committed under a sudden attack of homicidal mania. It was held that he was guilty of murder.¹⁴ Where it appeared that the accused was, at the time of the commission of the offence, suffering from fever, his temperature was about 100 degrees, and he was not delirious, it was held that he could not be considered as temporarily insane.¹⁵

Homicide by ganja-smoker.—The accused, a habitual ganja-smoker, killed his wife and children, because she quarrelled with him and objected to go to a village where he proposed to go. It was held that until the accused's habit of smoking ganja had induced in him such a diseased state of mind as to make him incapable of knowing the nature of his act or criminality, this section did not apply in his favour.¹⁶

Homicide under influence of religious enthusiasm.—Where a father sacrificed his son because wealth had not accompanied the son's birth and afterwards cut his own throat as a protest against his deity's injustice, he was held guilty of murder. The Court said: "Although there may have been some degree of religious enthusiasm or even hallucination, there is nothing to show that Bishen [the father] killed his child whilst in a state of mind that incapacitated him from knowing right from wrong. It seems to us rather that he did expect to receive some worldly benefit from the sacrifice of his son, and that wealth would come to him, and his dead child be restored to life again together."¹⁷ Where the accused, the priest of a temple, killed a five months' old female child in the belief that the goddess wanted sacrifice and his defence was that he was not in his senses but inspired, and it was not proved that he was incapable of knowing the nature of the act he did or what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law and it was also not proved that before or after the occurrence he was anything but a sane person, it was held that it was not a case in which the accused had in a state of paroxysm, religious or otherwise, on the spot and instantaneously committed murder to establish a defence of insanity within the meaning of this section.¹⁸

Melancholic homicidal mania.—The accused who was charged with committing murder was a young man of weak intellect, and the motive actuating the offence was trivial and inadequate. As soon as he had killed his uncle by hacking him on the head and neck with a sword, the accused rushed about, brandishing his weapon and shouting "Victory to Kali". He attempted to strike other persons, including his own father. When the paroxysm had passed off, during the police enquiry, the accused appeared to be rational, but immediately afterwards, he developed aphasia, attempted to commit suicide and was undoubtedly insane from that time for a period of five years. It was held that the above were the signs and indicia of insanity as expressed in works on the subject of medical jurisprudence, and that the accused was suffering from a fit of melancholic homicidal mania at the time he hacked the deceased with the sword and was, by reason of unsoundness of mind, incapable of knowing that he was doing an act which was wrong or contrary to law, and therefore he was not guilty of murder.¹⁹

Homicide under influence of morbid feeling.—The accused was seen near a boy who was playing in a public place. Some hours afterwards the child's dead body was found there; the throat was cut and there were marks of a violent struggle. The accused gave himself up and admitted the act, recounting all the circumstances with perfect intelligence. He said that he had done the act from a morbid feeling; that he was tired of life and wished to be rid of it. It was held that he was guilty of murder.²⁰

The accused killed his wife and child. There was no apparent motive to explain the double murder and the accused admitted without reservation what he had done and made no attempt at concealment or escape. According to the accused his mind was a blank at the time of the occurrence and he was not conscious of what he did. There was some evidence that the accused had not been quiet himself, that he had been disturbed and distressed by the shortage of cloth, rice and fodder. There was no reliable evidence that his intellect was deranged. It was held that he was guilty of murder.²¹

Where the accused being driven to desperation on account of starvation and being unable to get any food to nourish her infant daughter, killed her daughter, it was held that the mere fact that the accused was in a state of desperation did not entitle her to claim exemption under this section, but the case was not a fit one for the infliction of capital sentence.²²

Homicide without motive.—The accused, a soldier, shot his officer through the head; the only evidence for the defence being that the act was sudden, without apparent motive, and that he had been addicted to drink, and had been suffering under depression. It was held that that was not enough to raise the defence of insanity, that the sole question was whether the accused fired the gun intending to kill, and that his expressions soon after the act were evidence of that, and that the alleged inadequacy of motive was immaterial, the question being not of motive but intent.²³

Mere absence of motive for a crime howsoever atrocious it may be, cannot, in the absence of plea and proof of legal insanity, bring the case within the exemption under this section, because a crime is not excused by its own atrocity and one must look outside the act itself for the evidence as to how much the accused knew about it.²⁴

Homicide under influence of insane delusions caused by loss of blood.—A married woman killed her husband immediately after an apparent recovery from a disease which had caused a great loss of blood and brought on insane delusions of the senses, and which had been renewed at the time of murder. It was held that she had not been in such a state of mind at the time of the act as to know its nature or be accountable for it.²⁵

Homicide by person in paroxysm of insanity.—Where a married woman, fondly attached to her children, and apparently most happy in her family, poisoned two of them, but it appeared that there was insanity in her family, it was held that she was not guilty as she had been in a paroxysm of insanity at the time of the act.¹

Homicide by monomaniac.—Where the accused labouring under a notion that the inhabitants of Hadleigh and particularly one C were continually issuing warrants against him with intent to deprive him of his liberty and life, shot C, it was held that the accused laboured under that species of insanity which was called monomania and was therefore not liable for his act.²

Homicide by person suffering from failure of reasoning powers.—Where the accused cut his wife's throat without any rational motive, and was captured at once without any attempt on his part to escape or offer resistance, and the evidence showed that before the commission of the offence he suffered from a failure of reasoning powers, and also that he entertained delusions as to dangers which threatened his wife, it was held that the facts proved unsoundness of mind which prevented the accused from knowing the nature of his act.³

Homicide during epileptic fit.—The accused murdered his mother and wounded his step-father in a fit of epilepsy without any apparent cause. After the murder the accused hid in a ravine. The medical evidence showed that the accused was subject to epileptic fits and he used to be completely unconscious during such time. It was held that the accused was guilty of the acts charged but not so as to be responsible in law for his action.⁴

Attempt to commit homicide.—The accused was convicted of attempt to commit murder (s. 307). It was found from the evidence of the prosecution witnesses that he was known as "Mad Nga Pyan"; that immediately before his attack he was noticed by persons to be in one of his mad fits, that he was suffering under a delusion that one whom he attacked was keeping his sisters and daughters in the monastery, that he confessed to the investigating officer and the headman, that he stopped going on with the attack when he was asked to do so, that the act was utterly unprovoked and motiveless. It was held under those circumstances that the accused at the time of committing the offence was incapable by reason of unsoundness of mind of knowing the nature of the act or that it was wrong or contrary to law.⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Where a plea of insanity is raised, the Court has to consider two issues. Firstly, whether the accused has established that at the time of committing the act he was of unsound mind. If he does not succeed in this preliminary issue, the plea fails. Secondly, if he was of unsound mind, whether he has established that the unsoundness of mind was of a degree and nature to satisfy one of the tests laid down by the section.⁶ In all cases where legal insanity is set up as a defence it is very material to consider the circumstances which have preceded, attended and followed the crime, viz., (1) whether there were deliberation and preparation for the act, (2) whether it was done in a manner which showed a desire for concealment, (3) whether, after the crime, the offender showed consciousness of guilt and made efforts to avoid detection, and (4) whether after his arrest, he offered false excuses and made false statements.⁷ The facts that the conduct of the accused at the time of the trial was unusual and that his father was insane were held not to justify the conclusion that the accused at the time of committing the offence was of unsound mind.⁸ But to prove a plea of insanity, evidence that the grandfather of the person had been insane may be adduced, after it has been proved by medical testimony that such a disease is often hereditary in a family.⁹ Evidence as to the accused's conduct before and after up to the time of trial is admissible as presumptive evidence of his mental condition when the act was committed. The absence of all motive for a crime, when corroborated by independent evidence of the accused's previous insanity, is not without weight.¹⁰

Evidence of experts is relevant in matters of insanity.¹¹ A deposition of a Civil Surgeon directed by s. 464 of the Criminal Procedure Code should be taken. He should be questioned as to the number of times he had himself seen the accused, the nature of his conversation with him, and all the circumstances from which he is led to regard him of sound or unsound mind.¹²

A medical man, conversant with the disease of insanity, who never saw the accused previously to the trial, but who was present during the whole trial and the examination of all the witnesses, cannot be asked his opinion as to the state of the accused's mind at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, or his opinion whether the accused was conscious, at the time of doing the act, that he was acting contrary to law, or whether he was labouring under any and what delusion at the time. Because each of these questions involves the determination of the truth of the facts deposed to, which it is for the jury to decide. But where the facts are admitted or not disputed, and the question becomes substantially one of science only, it may be convenient to allow the question to be put, though the same cannot be insisted on as a matter of right.¹³ In a subsequent case, however, it was decided that, notwithstanding the opinion of the Judges in M'Naghton's case, a physician who had been in Court during the whole trial could not be asked whether, having heard the whole evidence, he was of opinion that the accused at the time he committed the alleged act was of unsound mind. The proper mode of examination was to take particular facts, and assuming them to be true, to ask the witness whether, in his judgment, they were indicative of insanity on the part of the accused at the time the alleged act was committed.¹⁴ A medical man may be asked whether such and such appearances proved by other witnesses are, in his judgment, symptoms of insanity. But he cannot be asked whether, from the other testimony given, the act with which the accused is charged is, in his opinion, an act of insanity, as this is the very point to be decided by the jury.¹⁵ He may give his opinion as to the state of mind, not as to the responsibility of the accused. The latter is for the jury, under the direction of the Judge.¹⁶ Where, for instance, a person is in a state of mind in which she is liable to fits of madness, it is for the jury to consider whether the act done was during such a fit though there is nothing before or after the act to indicate it.¹⁷ The subtle essence which we call 'mind' defies, of course, ocular inspection and can only be known by its outward manifestations. By the language and conduct of the man, his thoughts and emotions are read. According as they conform to, or contrast with, the practice of people of sound mind, the large majority of mankind, we form our judgment as to his mental soundness. For this reason evidence is admissible to show that his conduct and language at different times and on different occasions indicated some morbid condition of his intellectual powers; and the more extended the view of his life, the safer is the judgment formed of him. Everything relating to his physical and mental history is relevant. Evidence as to insanity in his parents and immediate relatives may also be pertinent. It is never allowable to infer insanity in an accused person from the mere fact of its existence in his ancestors. But when testimony directly tending to prove insane conduct on the part of the accused himself has been given, evidence of his family antecedents is admissible as corroborative of that testimony.¹⁸ Where a plea of insanity is set up, the accused's counsel has no right, in his address to the jury, to quote the opinions of medical men as given in their works.¹⁹ Because a case from a work on medical jurisprudence is no evidence in a Court of Justice. It is a mere statement by a medical man of hearsay facts of cases at which he was in all probability not present.²⁰

The fact of unsoundness of mind is one which must be clearly proved before any jury is justified in returning a verdict.²¹

Presumption.—The law presumes every person at the age of discretion to be sane unless the contrary is proved; and even if a lunatic has lucid intervals the law presumes the offence of such person to have been committed in a lucid interval unless it appears to have been committed during derangement.²²

This point has been elaborately discussed in a case in which it is said : "There is some difference of opinion between medical and legal jurists, namely how far insanity may be inferred solely from the nature of the act complained of and the conduct of the accused in respect of it. I am concerned only with the legal and not with the medical view of the question, and there is ample judicial authority for the view that it is utterly unsafe to admit a defence of insanity upon arguments merely derived from the character of the crime.

"In *Regina v. Stokes*²³ Rolfe, B., said :—'It would be a most dangerous doctrine to lay down, that because a man committed a desperate offence, with the chance of instant death, or the certainty of future punishment before him, he was therefore insane—as if the perpetration of crimes was to be excused by their very atrocity.'

"In *Regina v. Haynes*²⁴ Bramwell, B., said to the jury :—'It has been urged... that you should acquit him [the prisoner] on the ground that, it being impossible to assign any motive for the perpetration of the offence, he must have been acting under what is called a powerful and irresistible influence, or homicidal tendency. But... the circumstance of an act being apparently motiveless is not a ground from which you can safely infer the existence of such an influence. Motives exist unknown and innumerable which might prompt the act. A morbid and restless (but resistible) thirst for blood would itself be a motive urging to such a deed for its own relief. But if an influence be so powerful as to be termed irresistible, so much the more reason is there why we should not withdraw any of the safeguards tending to counteract it. There are three powerful restraints existing, all tending to the assistance of the person who is suffering under such an influence—the restraint of religion, the restraint of conscience and the restraint of law. But if the influence itself be held a legal excuse, rendering the crime dispensable, you at once withdraw a most powerful restraint—that forbidding and punishing its perpetration.'

"These remarks are very pertinent in a country where we have constantly to deal with criminals upon whose savage instincts neither religion nor conscience can be seriously regarded as restraints, and who can only be kept from the most atrocious crimes against the persons of others by their fear of the law. Human nature is manifold. Man, at his best, is only a very highly developed animal, with all the instincts and passions of the inferior animals. In him they are softened, modified and controlled by generations of civilization and education, and restrained by example, social opinion, and the fear of punishment in this world or the next. Man, at his worst, is very little above the lower animals, and is only made more dangerous by that reason which distinguishes him from them. With him, criminal longings are natural and familiar, and he is only kept from yielding to them by a dread of punishment. Cruelty—that is, a desire to inflict suffering for the pleasure of witnessing it—is a natural instinct. We find it in the highly civilized and educated despot who is freed from all restraint by the possession of absolute power : we find it in all classes of reasoning mankind : we find it in children who are left to follow the promptings of their own natures and we find it in nearly all the lower animals. It is this natural instinct which lends to a real battle far more interest than is conveyed by the most scientific of sham fights, not only to those fighting, but to those looking on, whatever may be the excuses and justifications used to cover the bloodshed. It is because of this natural instinct that the most humane, educated, highly civilized, and sometimes most religious, sportsmen are conscious—very clearly conscious—of a greater pleasure in shooting at living game than at inanimate targets of any kind, however carefully devised to satisfy the mere desire for skill in the use of weapons. Many other instances of the kind might be put forward. Education, religion, civilization, all strive to cover up or find excuses for this blood-thirstiness, but it is there as part of our animal nature; it may be controlled into absolute impotence, but it can never be eradicated.

"The crime called 'running amok' is common enough in India. In some few cases it may be due to real insanity, or to a temporary mental disorder caused by drugs or other intoxicants. But I believe that in the majority of cases it is nothing but the reckless indulgence of a natural desire to kill. The records of criminal justice in India teem with cases where the injury inflicted by the criminal on his victim is out of all proportion to the motive or provocation which gave rise to the crime, and this, where there has not been the least reason for suspecting any degree of insanity. I have, in my own limited experience, had cases where a young boy, some 15 years of age, killed his sleeping father for the sake of getting hold of five rupees in the pocket of the latter; where a young man killed his sleeping mother after deliberate premeditation, because of a petty dispute as to his share in the family rice crop; and where a perfectly sane and affectionate father dashed out the brains of his favourite child—a boy 2 or 3 years of age—in order to point a curse at a creditor who was pressing him for a petty debt. Each of these cases simply shewed the breaking out of a naturally savage nature, through the feeble, artificially created, restraint which usually kept it down.

"In the cases of a large majority of Indian rustics of the class of the accused, the lack of education and the narrow vista of a village life, result in their having only a vague idea of the power of the law, and their want of knowledge and imagination prevents them from realizing anything even approximate to the more serious of the consequences that may ensue from disobedience to it. It is not therefore surprising that in moments of mental excitement this restraining phantom easily fades from view, and acts are done that shock and surprise educated and law-abiding men, and give them an impression that mental derangement alone can account for such criminality. It is such an impression, no doubt, that led the District Magistrate in the present case to his finding of what has been called 'inferential insanity.' But it was an erroneous inference. It probably arose from an unconscious but natural tendency which we all have of judging others by ourselves. The Magistrate having concluded with ease and certainty that he would never have committed such motiveless acts of violence except in a state of insanity, proceeded to infer that nobody else, including the criminal before him, would likewise do them except under a like disability. We often hear the expression 'No one but a mad-man would do such a thing': but a closer examination will always convince the speaker that he is measuring others by the standard of his own mind, and running all the risks of inaccuracy which attend upon the custom of drawing general conclusions from particular cases. When dissected in this way, the fallacy of the argument that because no sane District Magistrate would run amok, wounding people with an axe, therefore no illiterate rustic would do so, unless insane, will be evident to everybody. Circumstantial evidence, to justify a judicial finding solely based on it, must be of a kind which excludes all other reasonable and probable hypotheses except the one set up. The accused in this case suddenly wounded two men, apparently without motive, and laughed when questioned about his conduct shortly after. Such conduct is of course consistent with his being insane: but it is at least equally consistent with the mere indulgence of a savage but reasoning instinct—with a brutal but perfectly sane desire to cause blood-shed—with a foolish and reckless but still not insane craving for notoriety—and with possibly one or more or several other rational and culpable states of minds. Therefore accused's conduct alone cannot furnish a safe, or even a legal, basis to support the theory of insanity of any kind—let alone legal insanity—to the exclusion of all these other hypotheses with equal claims to a locus standi. The finding of the Magistrate is unsupported by any evidence of hereditary tendency towards mental disorder, or of any other cause for impairment of the intellect, or of a single display of previous or subsequent eccentricity on the part of the accused; and it is therefore impossible to sustain the inference upon which accused has been discharged. On the contrary, his conduct in running away and concealing himself in the house of a friend in another village, immediately after he had wounded the two men, seems to me a strong indication of the existence of a consciousness in his mind that he had done what was wrong. So that, even if we could infer the presence of a certain amount of mental derangement, it did not amount to legal insanity, since the cognitive faculty had apparently not been destroyed by it."²⁵

Onus.—The burden of proving the defence afforded by this section rests on the accused.¹ That onus may be discharged by producing evidence as to the conduct of the accused shortly prior to the offence and his conduct at the time or immediately afterwards, also by evidence of his mental condition, his family history and so forth. Mere absence of motive is not a sufficient ground upon which mania may be inferred.² But if it is apparent from the evidence on the record, whether produced by the prosecution or by the defence, that a general exception would apply, then it is open to the Court to consider whether the evidence proves to its satisfaction that the accused comes within the exception.³ Mental derangement a year previous to the act being committed, combined with peculiar circumstances, has been held sufficient to shift the burden of proof.⁴ The evidence must prove an alienation of reason preventing the moral sense.⁵

Procedure.—The procedure for the trial of insane persons is laid down in Chapter XXXIV of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Where the defence of insanity is set up, in order to warrant the jury in acquitting the accused, it must be proved affirmatively that he is insane, if the fact be left in doubt, and if the crime charged in the indictment be proved, it is their duty to convict.⁶ The plea of insanity can be raised even in appeal.⁷

Punishment.—Partial delusion, or the mere existence of mental disease, does not exempt a person from criminal responsibility, though mental weakness, caused by disease, is an extenuating circumstance affecting the sentence.⁸ The accused had intentionally killed another man, and it was found on the evidence that he was at the time insane, but not to such a degree that he did not know the nature of his act or that what he was doing was wrong and contrary to law. It was held that although the accused was not entitled to the benefit of this section, it was not proper that he should be hanged, but rather he should be sentenced to transportation for life, so that the Government might be in a position to make such modification (if any) of the sentence as might be indicated by further observation of the accused.⁹

Acquittal.—The following is suggested as a suitable form of finding of acquittal on the ground of insanity :—

“The Court, concurring with the Assessors, finds that—did kill—by striking him on the head with a club, but that, by reason of unsoundness of mind, he was incapable of knowing that he was doing an act which was wrong or contrary to law, and that he is not therefore guilty of the offence specified in the charge, viz.,—and the Court directs that the said—be acquitted, and that, under the provisions of s. 471, Criminal Procedure Code, the said—be kept in safe custody in the—pending the orders of the Local Government.”¹⁰

85. Nothing is an offence which is done by a person who, at the time of doing it, is, by reason of intoxication, incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is either wrong, or contrary to law : provided that the thing which intoxicated him was administered to him without his knowledge¹ or against his will.

Act of a person incapable of judgment by reason of intoxication caused against his will.

ous.¹² It is a species of madness for which the mad man is to blame. The law pronounces that the obscurity and divestment of that judgment and human feeling which in a sober state would have prevented the accused from offending, shall not, when produced by his voluntary act, screen him from punishment, although he be no longer capable of self-restraint.¹³ Qui peccat ebrius, luat sobrius: let him who sins when drunk be punished when sober.¹⁴

Drunkenness makes no difference to the knowledge with which a man is credited and if a man knew what the natural consequences of his acts were he must be presumed to have intended to cause them.¹⁵ This section deals with the question of the knowledge possessed by an accused person at the time he commits the offence and leaves quite open the question of intention. On the question how far drunkenness is an excuse for a crime the proper test is that laid down in the case of Director of Public Prosecutions v. Beard.¹⁶ The test to apply is not the test applied in cases of insanity, viz., whether the accused person knew what he was doing was wrong or was able to appreciate the nature and quality of his act. The correct test is whether by reason of drunkenness the accused person was incapable of forming an intention of committing the offence.¹⁷

Evidence of drunkenness which renders the accused incapable of forming the specific intent essential to constitute the crime ought to be taken into consideration with the other facts proved in order to determine whether he had that intent, but evidence of drunkenness falling short of a proved incapacity in the accused to form the intent necessary to constitute the crime, and merely establishing that his mind was affected by drink so that he more readily gave way to some violent passion, does not rebut the presumption that a man intends the natural consequences of his acts. The accused became very drunk, but knew what he was doing. He went to his house, took hold of a dah and going along the road shouted his intention to kill a person with whom he had had a dispute. A person on the road gently tried to pacify him and thereupon the accused not only threatened to cut him, but followed him and inflicted such wounds on him that the person died. It was held that the accused should be imputed with the same knowledge as he would have had he been sober, and his act amounted to murder for which there were no extenuating circumstances.¹⁸

"If a man chooses to get drunk, it is his own voluntary act: it is very different from a madness which is not caused by any act of the person. That voluntary species of madness which it is in a party's power to abstain from, he must answer for. However, with regard to the intention, drunkenness may perhaps be adverted to according to the nature of the instrument used. If a man uses a stick, you would not infer a malicious intent so strongly against him, if drunk, when he made an intemperate use of it, as you would if he had used a different kind of weapon; but where a dangerous instrument is used, which, if used, must produce grievous bodily harm, drunkenness can have no effect on the consideration of the malicious intent of the party."¹⁹

Although simple frenzy occasioned immediately by drunkenness is no excuse yet if by one or more such practices, an habitual or fixed frenzy be caused, though this madness was contracted by the vice and will of the party, yet this habitual and fixed frenzy thereby caused puts the man into the same condition in relation to crimes, as if the same were contracted involuntarily at first.²⁰

1. 'Without his knowledge.'—If a man is made drunk through stratagem or the fraud of others, or through ignorance, or through any other means causing intoxication without the man's knowledge or against his will, he is excused. If a person, by the unskilfulness of his physician, or by the contrivance of his enemies, eat or drink such a thing as causes such a temporary or permanent frenzy, this puts him into the same condition as any other frenzy, and equally excuses him.²¹

86. In cases where an act done is not an offence unless done with a particular knowledge or intent, a person who does the act in a state of intoxication shall be liable to be dealt with as if he had the same knowledge as he would have had if he had not been intoxicated, unless the thing which intoxicated him was administered to him without his knowledge or against his will.

Offence requiring a particular intent or knowledge committed by one who is intoxicated.

COMMENT.

As certain guilty knowledge or intention forms part of the definitions of many offences, this section is provided to meet those cases. It says that a person voluntarily drunk will be deemed to have the same knowledge as he would have had if he had not been intoxicated.

The Madras High Court has held that the second part of the section speaks of knowledge only and omits any reference to intent. Whether this omission is intentional or not, it may be due to the fact that in the majority of cases the question of intention is merely the question of knowledge. If the accused knew what the natural consequences of his acts were, ordinarily he must be deemed to have intended to cause them. Though ordinarily intention is to be inferred from knowledge there must be cases where intent must be found as a fact and cannot be assumed, in which cases voluntary drunkenness may be relied on to show that the required 'intent' is absent. Where the evidence shows that the accused knew that the act he was doing was a wrongful act, the Court can presume from such knowledge that he must have had the criminal intent requisite for the offence.²²

The Patna High Court has held that there may be cases in which a particular knowledge is an ingredient, and there may be other cases in which a particular intent is an ingredient, the two are not necessarily always identical. This section does not say that he shall be liable to be dealt with as if he had the same intention as might have been presumed if he had not been intoxicated.²³

The Calcutta High Court has in an early case observed: "Voluntary drunkenness does not, of course, palliate any offence, but it is generally taken into account as throwing light on the question of intention."²⁴ The Legislature appears to have intended to make a distinction between the presumption as to knowledge and the presumption as to intention, and though ordinarily intention is to be inferred from knowledge, it is not to be inferred when the knowledge is merely a legal fiction.²⁵ Although there is a presumption so far as knowledge is concerned, there is no such presumption with regard to intention.

A full bench of the former Chief Court of Lower Burma laid down that the omission of any express provision in this section regarding the intention which is to be attributed to a drunken man doing an act which is an offence when done with a particular knowledge or intent leaves it open to the Courts to deal with the question of intention on the general principles of law. The drunkenness of an accused person at the time he committed the act, charged as an offence, may be and should be taken into consideration in cases where intention on the part of the accused is necessary to constitute the offence charged, and that the intention which would be ascribed to a sober man in connection with an act must not necessarily be ascribed to a drunken man who does the same act. The question of intention must be determined in each individual case according to the actual facts proved according to accepted principles.¹ Intoxication should be taken into consideration in cases where intention on the part of the accused is necessary to constitute the offence charged and the intention which would be ascribed to a sober man in connection with that act must not necessarily be ascribed to an intoxicated man who does the same act. If the accused was so drunk as to be unable to form the intent to kill the offence would be one of manslaughter, i.e., culpable homicide.²

The former Chief Court of the Punjab had held that although this section attributed to a drunken man the knowledge of a sober man when judging of his action, it did not give him the same intention, and, therefore, drunkenness or a state of intoxication afforded a sufficient excuse for not exacting the extreme penalty of the law.³ Pal Singh's case was distinguished in a subsequent case in which it was said that in that case the accused had no motive to cause the death of his victim and that the attack was a sudden one. Where, however, the accused primed themselves with drink in order to wreak vengeance upon their enemy and beat him mercilessly, the penalty of death was inflicted.⁴ Though voluntary drunkenness cannot excuse the commission of an offence, yet where, as upon a charge of murder, the question is whether an act was premeditated or done only from sudden heat and impulse, the fact of the party being intoxicated is held to be a circumstance proper to be taken into consideration. The sentence of death was accordingly commuted to transportation for life.⁵ Unless drunkenness amounts to unsoundness of mind so as to enable insanity to be pleaded by way of defence, or the degree of drunkenness is such as to establish incapacity in the accused to form the intent necessary to constitute the crime, drunkenness is neither a defence nor a palliation.⁶ The Rangoon High Court has held to the contrary.⁷

In England it has been held that where the intention of a person committing a crime is an element of the crime itself, the fact that he was intoxicated at the time he committed the act may be taken into consideration in considering whether he formed the intention necessary to constitute the crime.⁸ The House of Lords after referring to various cases have laid down that evidence of drunkenness which renders the accused incapable of forming the specific intent essential to constitute the crime ought to be taken into consideration, with the other facts proved, in order to determine whether or not he had this intent. Evidence of drunkenness falling short of a proved incapacity in the accused to form the intent necessary to constitute the crime, and merely establishing that his mind was affected by drink so that he more readily gave way to some violent passion, does not rebut the presumption that a man intends the natural consequences of his acts.⁹ The Court of Criminal Appeal has held that intoxication may reduce homicide to manslaughter.¹⁰ It has also held that drunkenness is not a good defence unless it can be positively proved that it was of such a nature that the accused did not know the difference between right and wrong.¹¹

CASE.

The accused became very drunk, but knew what he was doing. He went to his house, took hold of a dah and going along the road shouted his intention to kill a person with whom he had had a dispute. A person on the road gently tried to pacify him and thereupon the accused not only threatened to cut him, but followed him and inflicted such wounds on him that the person died. It was held that the accused must be imputed with the same knowledge as he would have had had he been sober, and his act amounted to murder for which there were no extenuating circumstances.¹²

87. Nothing which is not intended to cause death, or grievous hurt,¹ and which is not known by the doer to be likely to cause death, or grievous hurt, is an offence by reason of any harm which it may cause, or be intended by the doer to cause, to any person, above eighteen years of age, who has given consent,² whether express or implied, to suffer that harm; or by reason of any harm which it may be known by the doer to be likely to cause to any such person who has consented to take the risk of that harm.

Act not intended and not known to be likely to cause death or grievous hurt, done by consent.

ILLUSTRATION.

A and Z agree to fence with each other for amusement. This agreement implies the consent of each to suffer any harm which, in the course of such fencing, may be caused without foul play; and if A, while playing fairly, hurts Z, A commits no offence.

COMMENT.

This section appears to proceed upon the maxim volenti non fit injuria : he who consents suffers no injury. This rule is founded upon two very simple propositions : (1) that every person is the best judge of his own interest; (2) that no man will consent to what he thinks hurtful to himself.

Every man is free to inflict any suffering or damage he chooses on his own person and property; and if instead of doing this himself, he consents to its being done by another, the doer commits no offence. A man may give away his property; and so another who takes it by his permission does not commit theft. He may inflict self-torture or he may consent to suffer torture at the hands of another.¹⁴ The authors of the Code say : "We conceive the general rule to be, that nothing ought to be an offence by reason of any harm which it may cause to a person of ripe age who, undeceived, has given a free and intelligent consent to suffer that harm or to take the risk of that harm. The restrictions by which the rule is limited affect only cases where human life is concerned. Both the general rule and the restrictions may, we think, be easily vindicated. If Z, a grown man, in possession of all his faculties, directs that his valuable furniture shall be burned, that his pictures shall be cut to rags, that his fine house shall be pulled down, that the best horses in his stables shall be shot, that his plate shall be thrown into the sea, those who obey his orders, however capricious those orders may be, however deeply Z may afterwards regret that he gave them, ought not, as it seems to us, to be punished for injuring his property. Again, if Z chooses to sell his teeth to a dentist, and permits the dentist to pull them out, the dentist ought not to be punished for injuring Z's person. So if Z embraces the Mahomedan religion, and consents to undergo the painful rite which is the initiation into that religion, those who perform the rite ought not to be punished for injuring Z's person.

"The reason on which the general rule which we have mentioned rests is this, that it is impossible to restrain men of mature age and sound understanding from destroying their own property, their own health, their own comfort, without restraining them from an infinite number of salutary or innocent actions. It is by no means true that men always judge rightly of their own interest. But it is true that, in the vast majority of cases, they judge better of their own interest than any lawgiver, or any tribunal, which must necessarily proceed on general principles, and which cannot have within its contemplation the circumstances of particular cases and the tempers of particular individuals, can judge for them. It is difficult to conceive any law which should be effectual to prevent men from wasting their substance on the most chimerical speculation, and yet which should not prevent the construction of such works as the Duke of Bridgewater's canals. It is difficult to conceive any law which should prevent a man from capriciously destroying his property, and yet which should not prevent a philosopher, in a course of chemical experiments, from dissolving a diamond, or an artist from taking ancient pictures to pieces, as Sir Joshua Reynolds did, in order to learn the secret of the colouring. It is difficult to conceive any law which should prevent a man from capriciously injuring his own health, and yet which should not prevent an artisan from employing himself in callings which are useful and indeed necessary to society, but which tend to impair the constitutions of those who follow them, or a public-spirited physician from inoculating himself with the virus of a dangerous disease. It is chiefly, we conceive, for this reason, that almost all Governments have thought it sufficient to restrain men from harming others, and have left them at liberty to harm themselves.

"But though in general we would not punish an act on account of any harm which it might cause to a person who had consented to suffer that harm, we think that there are exceptions to this rule, and that the case in which death is intentionally inflicted is an exception.

"It appears to us that the reasons which render it highly expedient to inflict punishment in ordinary cases of harm done by consent of the person harmed do not exist here. The thing prohibited is not, like the destruction of property, or like the mutilation of the person, a thing which is sometimes pernicious, sometimes innocent, sometimes highly useful. It is always, and under all circumstances, a thing which a wise law-giver would desire to prevent, if it were only for the purpose of making human life more sacred to the multitude. We cannot prohibit men from destroying the most valuable effects, or from disfiguring the person of one who has given his unextorted and intelligent consent to such destruction or such disfiguration, without prohibiting at the same time gainful speculations, innocent luxuries, manly exercises, healing operations. But by prohibiting a man from intentionally causing the death of another, we prohibit nothing which we think it desirable to tolerate.

"It seems to us clear, therefore, that no consent ought to be a justification of the intentional causing of death."¹⁵

Scope.—The section does not permit a man to give his consent to anything intended or known to be likely to cause his own death or grievous hurt. It only justifies any harm short of grievous hurt. The question of benefit to the person harmed is immaterial under this section, though material under the preceding one. See also s. 91, infra.

1. 'Grievous hurt.'—See s. 320, infra.

2. 'Consent.'—See s. 90, infra, which gives a negative explanation of this word. 'Consent' is defined in the Indian Contract Act, s. 13, as follows:—"Two or more persons are said to consent when they agree upon the same thing in the same sense." Sir James Stephen says that in criminal law, 'consent' means "a consent freely given by a rational and sober person so situated as to be able to form a rational opinion upon the matter to which he consents." Where an act is in itself unlawful, consent can never be an available defence. There are well-established exceptions to the rule, e.g., in the case of friendly sporting contests or rough but innocent horseplay.¹⁶

A claimed to be proof against edged instruments and invited B to put his claim to test. B thereupon cut A on the arm inflicting a wound as a result of which A bled to death. It was held that A's consent was given under a misconception of fact but that in the circumstances B could not be supposed to be aware of his mistake. B had no intention of causing death or grievous hurt and was therefore entitled to the benefit of this section.¹⁷

Manly sports and exercises.—Ordinary games such as fencing, single sticks, boxing, football, and the like are protected by this section. A prize-fight is illegal, and all persons aiding and abetting therein are guilty of assault, and the consent of the person actually engaged in fighting to the interchange of blows does not afford any answer to the criminal charge of assault; but mere presence at the prize-fight does not as a matter of law necessarily render persons so present guilty of an assault as aiding and abetting in such fight.¹⁸ All persons who by their presence encourage a fight from which death ensues to one of the combatants are guilty of manslaughter, although they neither say nor do anything.¹⁹ No persons can by agreement go out to fight with deadly weapons, doing by agreement what the law says shall not be done and thus shelter themselves from the consequences of their acts.²⁰ All struggles in anger, whether by fighting or wrestling, or any other mode—all kinds of contests in anger are unlawful.²¹ There is nothing unlawful in sparring unless, perhaps, the men fight on until they are so weak that a dangerous fall is likely to be the result of the continuance of the game. Therefore, except in the latter case, death caused by an injury received during a sparring match, does not amount to manslaughter.²²

If death ensue in consequence of such games as are entered into to give strength, skill, or activity in the use of arms, or for sport or recreation, as wrestling by consent, playing at cudgels, fencing, archery, etc., it is held in England to be misadventure. The true principle which distinguishes such cases from those where death ensues in consequence of an intent to do a slight injury is, that here bodily harm is not the motive on either side. Proper caution and perfect fair play should be used on both sides: for, if any improper advantage be taken, it will amount to manslaughter.²³ If, while engaged in a friendly game, one of the players commits an unlawful act whereby death is caused to another, he is guilty of manslaughter. In such a case it is immaterial to consider whether the act which caused death was in accordance with the rules and practice of the game. The act would be unlawful if the person committing it intended to produce a serious injury to another, or if, in committing an act which he knows may produce a serious injury, he is indifferent and reckless as to the consequences.²⁴

"It seems also, that in cases of friendly contests with weapons, which, though not of a deadly nature, may yet breed danger, there should be due warning given that each party may start upon equal terms. For if two were engaged to play at cudgels, and the one made a blow at the other, likely to hurt, before he was upon his guard, and without warning, from whence death ensued; the want of due and friendly caution would make such act amount to manslaughter, but not to murder, because the intent was not malicious.

"But though the weapons be of a dangerous nature, yet if they be not directed by the persons using them against each other, and so no danger to be reasonably apprehended; if death casually ensue, it is but misadventure."²⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prize-fight.—Although all persons present at and sanctioning a prize-fight, where one of the combatants is killed, are guilty of manslaughter, yet they are not such accomplices as require their evidence to be confirmed, if they are called as witnesses against other parties charged with the manslaughter.¹

88. Nothing, which is not intended to cause death, is an offence by reason of any harm which it may cause, or be intended by the doer to cause, or be known by the doer to be likely to cause, to any person for whose benefit¹ it is done in good faith, and who has given a consent,² whether express or implied, to suffer that harm, or to take the risk of that harm.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, a surgeon, knowing that a particular operation is likely to cause the death of Z, who suffers under a painful complaint, but not intending to cause Z's death, and intending, in good faith, Z's benefit, performs that operation on Z, with Z's consent. A has committed no offence.

COMMENT.

No consent can justify an intentional causing of death. But a person for whose benefit a thing is done, may consent that another shall do that thing, even if death may probably ensue. The last section allows any harm to be inflicted short of grievous hurt : this section sanctions the infliction of any harm as it is for the benefit of the person to whom it is caused.

The authors of the Code say : "In general we have made no distinction between cases in which a man causes an effect designedly, and cases in which he causes it with a knowledge that he is likely to cause it. If, for example, he sets fire to a house in a town at night, with no other object than that of facilitating a theft, but being perfectly aware that he is likely to cause people to be burned in their beds, and thus causes the loss of life, we punish him as a murderer. But there is, as it appears to us, a class of cases in which it is absolutely necessary to make a distinction. It is often the wisest thing that a man can do to expose his life to great hazard. It is often the greatest service that can be rendered to him to do what may very probably cause his death. He may labour under a cruel and wasting malady which is certain to shorten his life, and which renders his life, while it lasts, useless to others and a torment to himself. Suppose that under these circumstances he, undeceived, gives his free and intelligent consent to take the risk of an operation which in a large proportion of cases has proved fatal, but which is the only method by which his disease can possibly be cured, and which, if it succeeds, will restore him to health and vigour. We do not conceive that it would be expedient to punish the surgeon who should perform the operation, though by performing it he might cause death, not intending to cause death but knowing himself to be likely to cause it. Again, if a person attacked by a wild beast should call out to his friends to fire, though with imminent hazard to himself, and they were to obey the call, we do not conceive that it would be expedient to punish them, though they might by firing cause his death, and though when they fired they knew themselves to be likely to cause his death. We propose, therefore, that it shall be no offence to do even what the doer knows to be likely to cause death if the sufferer being of ripe age has, undeceived, given a free and intelligent consent to stand the risk, and if the doer did not intend to cause death, but on the contrary, intended in good faith the benefit of the sufferer."² See also s. 91, infra.

1. 'Benefit'.—Mere pecuniary benefit is not benefit within the meaning of this section.³

2. 'Good faith, and who has given a consent.'—Nothing is said to be done in good faith which is done without due care and attention.⁴ Every person who enters into a learned profession undertakes to bring to the exercise of it a reasonable degree of care and skill. A surgeon undertakes that he will perform a cure, but he does not undertake to use the highest possible degree of care and skill. There may be persons who have higher education and greater advantages than he has, but he undertakes to bring a fair, reasonable, and competent degree of skill. He does not undertake to use the highest possible degree of skill.⁵ Any person, whether a licensed medical practitioner or not, who deals with the life or health of any person, is bound to have competent skill; and is bound to treat his patients with care, attention, and assiduity; and if a person dies for want of either, the person is guilty of manslaughter.⁶ To render a medical man liable for negligence, or want of due care and skill, it is not enough that there has been a less degree of skill than some other medical men might have shown, or a less degree of care than even he himself might have bestowed; nor is it enough that he himself acknowledges some degree of want of care, there must have been a want of competent and ordinary care and skill; and to such a degree as to have led to a bad result.⁷ The Court (or the jury) has to consider whether in the execution of that duty which a doctor had undertaken to perform, he is proved to have shown such a gross want of care, or such a gross and culpable want of skill, as any person undertaking such a charge ought not to be guilty of.⁸ The question is whether, under all the circumstances, the accused acted with criminal inattention and carelessness.⁹

But if a person bona fide and honestly exercising the best skill to cure a patient, perform an operation which causes the patient's death, he is not guilty of manslaughter and it makes no difference whether the party be a regular or an irregular surgeon.¹⁰

The Court of Criminal Appeal in England has laid down that an act, unlawful per se as being criminal, cannot be rendered lawful because the person to whose detriment it is done consents to it. The Court observed: "If an act is unlawful in the sense of being in itself a criminal act, it is plain that it cannot be rendered lawful because the person to whose detriment it is done consents to it. No person can license another to commit a crime. So far as the criminal law is concerned, therefore, where the act charged is in itself unlawful, it can never be necessary to prove absence of consent on the part of the person wronged in order to obtain the conviction of the wrongdoer. There are, however, many acts in themselves harmless and lawful which become unlawful only if they are done without the consent of the person affected. What is, in one case, an innocent act of familiarity or affection, may, in another, be an assault, for no other reason than that, in the one case there is consent, and in the other consent is absent. As a general rule, although it is a rule to which there are well established exceptions, it is an unlawful act to beat another person with such a degree of violence that the infliction of bodily harm is a probable consequence, and when such an act is proved, consent is immaterial. . . . There are . . . well established exceptions to the general rule that an act likely or intended to cause bodily harm is an unlawful act. One of them is dealt with by Sir Michael Foster in the Chapter, just cited, where he refers to the case of persons who in perfect friendship engage by mutual consent in contests, such as 'cudgels, foils, or wrestling,' which are capable of causing bodily harm. . . . Another exception to the general rule, or, rather, another branch of the same class of exceptions, is to be found in cases of rough and undisciplined sport or play, where there is no anger and no intention to cause bodily harm. An example of this kind may be found in Reg. v. Bruce.¹¹ In such cases the act is not in itself unlawful, and it becomes unlawful only if the person affected by it is not a consenting party. . . . other exceptions to the rule. . . . are . . . the reasonable chastisement of a child by a parent or by a person in loco parentis. . . . we think that 'bodily harm' has its ordinary meaning and includes any hurt or injury calculated to interfere with the health or comfort of the prosecutor. Such hurt or injury need not be permanent, but must, no doubt, be more than merely transient and trifling."¹²

Unqualified persons.—The Law Commissioners observe that this section will not excuse dangerous operations performed by unqualified persons: "We apprehend that 'an unqualified and ignorant quack' could hardly be excused, for it is not to be conceived that such a one could obtain the free and intelligent consent of any person to his performing upon him an operation dangerous to life but by misrepresentation; and such a one could hardly satisfy a Court of Justice that he had undertaken the operation in good faith under cl. 72 (this section), for good faith must surely be construed here to mean, a conscientious belief that he had skill to perform the operation and by it to benefit the party, while the supposition is that he was unskilled and ignorant."¹³

A person not qualified, as not being a regular medical practitioner, but assuming to be, or to practise as such, and undertaking to treat another for a disease, is liable for injury caused by ignorant and improper treatment, by which the patient is rendered worse instead of better, and is injured by the use of improper medicine.¹⁴ A person who so 'takes a leap in the dark' is guilty of gross negligence.¹⁵ Death caused by administering an improper medicine is manslaughter.¹⁶ But even an unlicensed practitioner will not be criminally responsible for the death of a person, occasioned by his treatment, unless his conduct is characterised either by gross ignorance of his art, or gross inattention to his patient's safety.¹⁷ If he is guilty of gross negligence in attending his patient after he has applied a remedy, or of gross rashness in the application of it, and death ensues in consequence of either, he is liable to be convicted of manslaughter.¹⁸

A person uneducated in matters of surgery operated on a man for internal piles by cutting them with an ordinary knife, and the man died from hæmorrhage. He was charged, under s. 304A, with causing death by doing a rash and negligent act. It was contended that, inasmuch as the accused had performed similar operations on previous occasions, it was not a rash act within the meaning of that section, and that at all events he was entitled to the benefit of this section as he did the act in good faith, without any intention to cause death, and for the benefit of the patient who had accepted the risk. It was held that having regard to the meaning of "good faith" he was not entitled to the benefit of this section; and that this section did not apply to the case, as it was not shown by the accused that the deceased knew the risk he was running in consenting to the operation, and he could not therefore be said to have accepted the risk.¹⁹

The accused operated upon a patient for cataract, with the result that the patient lost the sight of her left eye. It was found that the operation was performed with the consent of the patient, and in good faith and for her benefit, and that it was performed in accordance with the recognized Indian method of treatment for cataract. It was held that the accused had committed no offence under the Code.²⁰

English cases.—In an action against a chemist and druggist upon an alleged retainer (as a surgeon and apothecary) to treat the plaintiff for a certain disorder (for which mercurial treatment was improper), it was held that mercurial treatment, in a case for which it was wholly unfit, was such negligence or ignorance as would sustain an action.²¹ A person in the habit of acting as a man-midwife tore away part of the prolapsed uterus of one of his patients, supposing it to be a part of the placenta, as a result of which the patient died. It was held that he was not indictable for manslaughter, unless he was guilty of criminal misconduct, arising either from the grossest ignorance or the most criminal inattention.²² The accused, a person not a regular practitioner, administered lobelia, a dangerous medicine, which produced death. It was held that the question for the jury was whether he had acted so rashly and carelessly as to cause death.²³ Any person who deals with the life or health of another person is bound to use competent skill and sufficient attention; if the patient dies for the want of either, the person is guilty of manslaughter.²⁴

89. Nothing which is done in good faith¹ for the benefit² of a person under twelve years of age, or of unsound mind, by or by consent, either express or implied, of the guardian or other person having lawful charge of that person, is an offence by reason of any harm which it may cause, or be intended by the doer to cause or be known by the doer to be likely to cause to that person : Provided—

ILLUSTRATION.

A, in good faith, for his child's benefit, without his child's consent, has his child cut for the stone by a surgeon, knowing it to be likely that the operation will cause the child's death, but not intending to cause the child's death. A is within the exception, inasmuch as his object was the cure of the child.

COMMENT.

To obtain the benefit of the exception embodied in this section it is necessary to show that the act done was for the benefit of the minor.²⁵ The section empowers the guardian of an infant under twelve years or an insane person to consent to inflict harm on the infant or the insane person provided it is done in good faith and is done for his benefit. Persons above twelve years are considered to be capable of giving consent under s. 88.

Object.—The authors of the Code observe : . "A lunatic may be in a state which makes it proper that he should be put into a straight waistcoat. A child may meet with an accident which may render the amputation of a limb necessary. But to put a strait waistcoat on a man without his consent is, under our definition, to commit an assault. To amputate a limb is, by our definition, voluntarily to cause grievous hurt and, as sharp instruments are used, is a very highly penal offence. We have therefore provided, by clause 71 (this section), that the consent of the guardian of a sufferer who is an infant or who is of unsound mind shall, to a great extent, have the effect which the consent of the sufferer himself would have, if the sufferer were of ripe age and sound mind."¹ See also s. 91, infra.

The following illustrations had been given by the authors of the Code² to illustrate the meaning of this section : but except illustration (d) all were omitted by the Commissioners. They, however, elucidate the purport of the section :—

(a) A, a parent, whips his child moderately, for the child's benefit. A has committed no offence.

(b) A confines his child, for the child's benefit. A has committed no offence.

(c) A, in good faith, for his daughter's benefit, intentionally kills her to prevent her from falling into the hands of Pindarries. A is not within the exception.

(d) A, in good faith, for his child's benefit, without his child's consent, has his child cut for the stone, knowing it to be likely that the operation will cause the child's death, but not intending to cause the child's death. A has committed no offence, inasmuch as his object was the preventing of death or grievous hurt to the child.

(e) A, in good faith, for his child's pecuniary benefit, emasculates his child. Here, inasmuch as A has caused grievous hurt to the child for a purpose other than the preventing of death or grievous hurt to the child, A is not within the exception.

(f) A, intending in good faith the pecuniary benefit of Z, his daughter, a child under twelve years of age, abets a rape committed by B on Z. Neither A nor B is within the exception.

2. 'Benefit'.—Mere pecuniary benefit is not benefit within the meaning of this section.³

A school-master may for purposes of discipline inflict moderate punishment and such punishment may be inflicted for offences committed not only within the school limits but also outside the school walls except when the school is closed for any length of time for a period of regular holidays.⁴

Provisos.—The authors of the Code say : "We cannot safely confide to him the interest of his neighbours in the same unreserved manner in which we confide to him his own, even when he sincerely intends to benefit his neighbours. Even parents have been known to deliver their children up to slavery in a foreign country, to inflict the most cruel mutilations on their male children, to sacrifice the chastity of their female children, and to do all this declaring, and perhaps with truth, that their object was something which they considered as advantageous to the children. We have therefore not thought it sufficient to require that on such occasions the guardian should act in good faith for the benefit of the ward. We have imposed several additional restrictions which, we conceive, carry their defence with them."⁵

90. A consent is not such a consent as is intended by any section of this Code, if the consent is given by a person under fear of injury,¹ or under a misconception of fact,² and if the person doing the act knows, or has reason to believe, that the consent was given in consequence of such fear or misconception : or Consent known to be given under fear or misconception.

if the consent is given by a person who, from unsoundness of mind, or intoxication, is unable to understand the nature and consequence of that to which he gives his consent; or Consent of insane person.

unless the contrary appears from the context, if the consent is given by a person who is under twelve years of age.

Consent of child.

COMMENT.

This section does not define 'consent' but describes what is not consent.

Consent is an act of reason, accompanied with deliberation, the mind weighing, as in a balance, the good and evil on each side.⁶ Consent means an active will in the mind of a person to permit the doing of the act complained of, and knowledge of what is to be done, or of the nature of the act that is being done, is essential to a consent to the act.⁷

Under this section the consent must be free, i.e., it must not be caused by coercion, fraud, or misrepresentation. Consent under the Code is not valid if obtained by either misrepresentation or concealment, and implies not only a knowledge of the risk but a judgment in regard to it, a deliberate free act of the mind.⁸ Suppose an ignorant person to represent himself as having skill to perform a difficult operation, and by this pretence to obtain consent to perform it, such consent can avail him nothing.⁹ But where the facts which invalidate a consent are unknown to the person to whom it is given, as if other persons without his knowledge represent that he possesses medical skill and thus obtain consent to his administering a potent medicine, etc., this will not make the consent invalid.

Object.—The object of this section is not to lay down that a child under twelve years of age is in fact incapable of expressing or withholding his or her consent to an act, but to provide that where the consent of a person may afford a defence to a criminal charge such consent must be a real consent, not vitiated by immaturity, misconception, misunderstanding, fear or fraud.¹⁰

Consent differs from submission.—"There is a difference between consent and submission; every consent involves a submission; but it by no means follows, that a mere submission involves consent."¹¹ "Mere submission by one who does not know the nature of the act done cannot be consent."¹²

1. 'Fear of injury.'—This is a very wide expression. 'Injury' seems to be limited to physical injury.

2. 'Misconception of fact.'—Consent given under a misconception is invalid, if the person to whom the consent is given is aware of its existence. An honest misconception by both the parties, however, does not invalidate the consent. In a case the private parts of the deceased were cut off by the accused who were eunuchs. The accused pleaded that a similar operation was performed on them; that they never understood the practice of emasculation to be forbidden; and that they acted under the free consent of the deceased. It was held that where a man of full age submitted himself to emasculation, performed neither by a skilful hand, nor in the least dangerous way, and died from the injury, the persons concerned in the act were guilty of culpable homicide and not murder.¹³ The accused, who professed to be snake-charmers, persuaded the deceased to allow themselves to be bitten by a poisonous snake, inducing them to believe that they had power to protect them from harm. It was held that the consent given by the deceased allowing themselves to be bitten did not protect the accused, such consent having been founded on a misconception of facts, that is, in the belief that the accused had power by charms to cure snake-bites and the accused knowing that the consent was given in consequence of such misconception.¹⁴ The accused was indicted for indecently assaulting two boys, each of whom was eight years of age. The boys stated in evidence that they did not know what he was going to do to them when he did each of the acts in question. It was held that the accused was guilty as the boys merely submitted to his act not knowing its nature.¹⁵

Misrepresentation.—A consent given on a misrepresentation of fact is one given under a misconception of fact within the meaning of this section. The misrepresentation should be regarded as leading to a misconception of the facts with reference to which the consent is given.¹⁶ The accused professed to give medical and surgical advice for money. The prosecutrix, a girl of nineteen, consulted him with respect to illness from which she was suffering. He advised that a surgical operation should be performed, and under pretence of performing it, had carnal connection with the prosecutrix. She submitted to what was done under the belief that he was merely treating her medically and performing a surgical operation. It was held that the accused was guilty of rape.¹⁷

Where a licensee removed from Government control timber of the kind which was not covered by his license by misleading the responsible officer to accept the revenue and to issue a removal pass and bill of title, then the consent of the officer for removal was no consent under this section and in the circumstances there was theft of the timber.¹⁸

Consent in cases of rape.—This section will only protect a man from the charge of rape if he has the intelligent consent of the prosecutrix. According to the English law a consent produced by mere animal instinct would be sufficient to prevent the act from constituting a rape.¹⁹ See s. 376, infra.

Indecent assault.—In two cases it has been held that an indecent assault is within the rule that fraud vitiates consent. In the first case, the accused, knowing that he had a foul disease, induced a girl, who was ignorant of his condition, to consent to sleep with him, and infected her.²⁰ In the second case, the accused having gonorrhoea had connection with a girl without informing her of the fact and the disease was communicated to her.²¹ It was held in both these cases that the accused was guilty of an indecent assault. But both these cases were unfavourably commented upon in The Queen v. Clarence,²² which practically lays down that concealment of the physical condition of the accused is not such a fraud as to create criminal liability. In this case the accused had connection with his wife at a time when he was suffering from gonorrhoea, the wife not knowing about the disease. It was held that the conduct of the accused did not amount to assault occasioning actual bodily harm. In each of the two cases mentioned above the prosecutrix was a young girl and not a town woman. In the case of a town woman a question may be raised as to the implied consent to take risks flowing from promiscuous embraces.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—The onus of proving consent is on the accused. The evidence of consent which would be sufficient in a civil transaction must be equally sufficient in exculpation of an accused's guilt.²³

91. The exceptions in sections 87, 88 and 89 do not extend to acts which are offences independently of any harm which they may cause, or be intended to cause, or be known to be likely to cause, to the person giving the consent, or on whose behalf the consent is given.

Exclusion of acts which are offences independently of harm caused.

ILLUSTRATION.

Causing miscarriage (unless caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the woman) is an offence independently of any harm which it may cause or be intended to cause to the woman. Therefore, it is not an offence "by reason of such harm"; and the consent of the woman or of her guardian to the causing of such miscarriage does not justify the act.

COMMENT.

This section says in explicit terms that consent will only condone the act causing harm to the person giving the consent which will otherwise be an offence. If the act is an offence independently of the harm which it has caused then the doer will not be protected by the consent given.

92. Nothing is an offence by reason of any harm which it may cause to a person for whose benefit¹ it is done in good faith³, even without that person's consent², if the circumstances are such that it is impossible for that person to signify consent, or if that person is incapable of giving consent, and has no guardian or other person in lawful charge of him from whom it is possible to obtain consent in time for the thing to be done with benefit : Provided—

Act done in good faith for benefit of a person without consent.

First.—That this exception shall not extend to the intentional causing of death, or the attempting to cause death;

Provisos.

Secondly.—That this exception shall not extend to the doing of anything which the person doing it knows to be likely to cause death, for any purpose other than the preventing of death or grievous hurt⁴ or the curing of any grievous disease or infirmity;

Thirdly.—That this exception shall not extend to the voluntary causing of hurt⁵, or to the attempting to cause hurt, for any purpose other than the preventing of death or hurt;

Fourthly.—That this exception shall not extend to the abetment of any offence, to the committing of which offence it would not extend.

benefit, performs the trepan before Z recovers his power of judging for himself. A has committed no offence.

(b) Z is carried off by a tiger. A fires at the tiger knowing it to be likely that the shot may kill Z, but not intending to kill Z, and in good faith intending Z's benefit. A's ball gives Z a mortal wound. A has committed no offence.

(c) A, a surgeon, sees a child suffer an accident which is likely to prove fatal unless an operation be immediately performed. There is not time to apply to the child's guardian. A performs the operation in spite of the entreaties of the child, intending, in good faith, the child's benefit. A has committed no offence.

(d) A is in a house which is on fire, with Z, a child. People below hold out a blanket. A drops the child from the housetop, knowing it to be likely that the fall may kill the child, but not intending to kill the child, and intending, in good faith, the child's benefit. Here even if the child is killed by the fall. A has committed no offence.

Explanation.—Mere pecuniary benefit⁶ is not benefit within the meaning of sections 88, 89 and 92.

COMMENT.

The logical place of this section would be after s. 89.

Object.—The principal object of ss. 88, 89 and this section is protection of medical practitioners. The authors of the Code observe :—

"There yet remains a kindred class of cases which are by no means of rare occurrence. For example, a person falls down in an apoplectic fit. Bleeding alone can save him, and he is unable to signify his consent to be bled. The surgeon who bleeds him commits an act falling under the definition of an offence. The surgeon is not the patient's guardian, and has no authority from any such guardian; yet it is evident that the surgeon ought not to be punished. Again, a house is on fire. A person snatches up a child too young to understand the danger, and flings it from the house-top, with a faint hope that it may be caught in a blanket below, but with the knowledge that it is highly probable that it will be dashed to pieces. Here, though the child may be killed by the fall, though the person who threw it down knew that it would very probably be killed, and though he was not the child's parent or guardian, he ought not to be punished.

"In these examples there is what may be called a temporary guardianship justified by the exigency of the case and by the humanity of the motive. This temporary guardianship bears a considerable analogy to that temporary magistracy with which the law invests every person who is present when a great crime is committed, or when the public peace is concerned. To acts done in the exercise of this temporary guardianship, we extend by clause 72 (this section) a protection very similar to that which we have given to the acts of regular guardians."²⁴

(1) A is rendered insensible by an accident which renders it necessary to amputate one of his limbs before he recovers his senses. The amputation of his limb without his consent is not an offence.

(2) If the accident made him mad, the amputation in spite of his resistance would be no offence.

(3) B is drowning and insensible. A, in order to save his life, pulls B out of the water with a hook which injures him. This is no offence.

Where the accused, a man of education and wealth and living in a town where medical attendance could be procured, chained up his brother, who was subject to fits of violent insanity with lucid intervals, for over three months in a cruel way, it was held that he could not be said to have acted with due care and attention and was guilty of an offence under s. 344.¹

3. 'Consent'.—See s. 90, supra. 4. 'Grievous hurt'.—See s. 320, infra.

5. 'Hurt'.—See s. 319, infra. Section 89 provides for 'grievous hurt' in a similar case.

6. 'Pecuniary benefit.'—The explanation to this section, coupled with s. 88, does not justify the performing of a dangerous surgical operation by an unskilled person, although it was not intended to cause death, for the mere pecuniary benefit of the person voluntarily submitting to it.²

93. No communication made in good faith¹ is an offence by reason of any harm to the person to whom it is made, if it is made for the benefit of that person.

Communication made in good faith.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, a surgeon, in good faith, communicates to a patient his opinion that he cannot live. The patient dies in consequence of the shock. A has committed no offence, though he knew it to be likely that the communication might cause the patient's death.

COMMENT.

This section is introduced to protect the innocent without unduly cloaking the guilty. It requires that communication should have been made (1) in good faith, and (2) for the benefit of the person to whom it is made. The illustration speaks of a surgeon. Very often a timely warning to the patient of his approaching death is necessary in order that he may be able to arrange his affairs to his own satisfaction. In such a case the doctor will be protected under this section if the patient dies of the shock resulting from the communication.

1. 'Good faith.'—Sec s. 52, supra.

94. Except murder, and offences against the State² punishable with death, nothing is an offence which is done by a person who is compelled to do it by threats, which, at the time of doing it, reasonably cause the apprehension that instant death to that person will otherwise be the consequence³: Provided the person doing the act did not of his own accord, or from a reasonable apprehension of harm to himself short of instant death, place himself in the situation by which he became subject to such constraint.

Act to which a person is compelled by threats.

Explanation 1.—A person who, of his own accord, or by reason of a threat of being beaten, joins a gang of dacoits, knowing their character, is not entitled to the benefit of this exception, on the ground of his having been compelled by his associates to do anything that is an offence by law.

Explanation 2.—A person seized by a gang of dacoits, and forced by threat of instant death, to do a thing which is an offence by law; for example, a smith compelled to take his tools and to force the door of a house for the dacoits to enter and plunder it, is entitled to the benefit of this exception.

COMMENT.

The Indian law about compulsion and necessity as a justification of an act otherwise criminal is based on the law of England. By this section a person is excused from the consequences of any act, except (1) murder, and (2) offences against the State punishable with death, done under fear of instant death. Fear of hurt or even of grievous hurt is not a sufficient justification. In English law fear of grievous hurt is a good justification.

Object.—Stephen³ says : “Criminal law is itself a system of compulsion on the widest scale. It is a collection of threats, of injury to life, liberty, and property if people do commit crimes. Are such threats to be withdrawn as soon as they are encountered by opposing threats? The law says to a man intending to commit murder, If you do it I will hang you. Is the law to withdraw its threat if some one else says, If you do not do it I will shoot you ?

“Surely it is at the moment when temptation to crime is strongest that the law should speak most clearly and emphatically to the contrary. It is, of course, a misfortune for a man that he should be placed between two fires, but it would be a much greater misfortune for society at large if criminals could confer impunity upon their agents by threatening them with death or violence if they refused to execute their commands. If impunity could be so secured a wide door would be opened to collusion, and encouragement would be given to associations of malefactors, secret or otherwise.”

1. ‘Except murder.’—See s. 300, infra, as to the definition of ‘murder.’ Murder committed under a threat of instant death is not excused under this section.⁴ But ‘murder’ does not include abetment of murder and therefore abetment of murder would be excused.⁵ If an offence is completed when all danger of instant death has been removed the person committing the offence is not protected under this section.⁶ Where a confessional statement by the wife, charged with abetment of murder, alleged that she held her husband’s legs while another struck him with an axe, but that she protested against the murder, and only assisted because such other person threatened to kill her also, it was held that the omission of the Judge to direct the jury that, if they believed the statement, she could not, having regard to this section, be convicted of abetment of murder under s. 109, was a misdirection vitiating the conviction.⁷

2. ‘Offences against the State.’—See s. 121, infra, for offences against the State punishable with death. The section provides that compulsion is not a defence to a charge under it, but it may operate in mitigation of punishment according to the circumstances of a case.⁸

3. ‘Threats, which, . . . cause the apprehension that instant death to that person will . . . be the consequence.’—There must be reasonable fear, at the very time, of instant death. Persons who do criminal acts from fear of anything but instant death do them at their peril.⁹ Persons who had offered or given bribes to certain officials in the Revenue Department of the Government in order to avoid pecuniary injury or personal molestation were not protected by this section.¹⁰ Mere menace of future death will not be sufficient. Where certain witnesses gave false evidence, and then pleaded that they were coerced to do so by a Police Inspector, it was held that they were guilty as there was no proof of instant death.¹¹ A policeman stood by, acquiescing in an assault on a prisoner committed by another policeman for the purpose of extorting a confession. He was bound under the Bombay District Police Act (Bom. IV of 1890) to arrest persons committing assaults likely to cause grievous bodily injury but he did not. It was held that nothing but fear of instant death was a defence for a policeman who tortured any one by orders of his superior.¹²

Where the accused of his own accord placed himself in a situation by which he became subject to the threats of another person, whatever threats may have been used towards him, the provisions of this section avail him nothing.¹³

Doctrine of compulsion and necessity.—“No one can plead the excuse of necessity or compulsion as a defence of an act otherwise penal, except as provided in s. 94. . . Lord Hale argues that our law is better than that laid down by the Jesuitical Casuists of France, in this respect, as it prevents aggrieved persons pretending to judge their own cause, and then proceeding to illegal means of redress, as when servants, judging themselves in want of clothes or victuals, get them by robbing their masters.¹⁴ Mr. Branson cited *Alexander Mac Growther's case*¹⁵ as showing how any other rule would make crime triumphant. Where some prisoners pleaded that in 1746 they joined the Duke of Perth in arms against the king, because they feared that their houses would be burned and their goods spoiled, all the Judges concurred that the prisoners were rightly convicted; and Sir M. Foster points out that if threats of this kind were an excuse, it would be in the power of any leader of a rebellion to indemnify all his followers." The same consideration applies to people who bribe public officers : a crime more common here than high treason. If the law allowed the bribers to escape criminal liability...by pleading and proving that they were put in fear of some pecuniary injury or some stoppage of promotion, that would be tantamount to encouraging the corruption, as the corrupt Judge or Officer would then be able by a politic use of threats to give an indemnity to all who paid him money...in dealing with the question of guilty or not, the law does not, where there is no fear of instant death, require the Courts to discuss the philosophy of free will, or determine whether the person who bribes to secure some advantage to himself is a victim of extortion, or feels helpless or not".¹⁶ "No man, from a fear of consequences to himself, has a right to make himself a party to committing mischief on mankind."¹⁷

The same learned Judge in another Bombay case¹⁸ remarks : "All our training as Judges, all the great decisions make us look with dislike on any theory which makes crime easy and excuses atrocious acts...Except where unsoundness of mind is proved, or real fear of instant death is proved, the burden being on the prisoner, the pressure of temptation is not an excuse for breaking the law...Our Courts have no duty cast on them of discussing the varying motives to crime as a matter of metaphysics—of sitting as did the fallen angels reasoning high of

'Providence, foreknowledge, will and fate.

Fixed fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute,

And found no end in wandering mazes lost.'"

See also the remarks of Lord Coleridge in *The Queen v. Dudley*¹⁹ (vide cases under s. 81, supra).

English law.—The English law excuses a person who has been forced to commit an offence by fear of death or of grievous bodily harm, except in cases of treason or homicide. The fear of having houses burnt, or goods spoiled, is no excuse in the eye of the law for joining and marching with rebels.²⁰ A person is excused, under certain conditions, if he is forced to levy war against the King or to adhere to the King's enemies provided he uses every reasonable endeavour to resist or escape.²¹ According to English law a married woman charged with the commission of any criminal act, except treason, homicide, and probably robbery, is, in case her husband shall be present at the time of the commission of such act, presumed to have acted under his coercion, and such coercion excuses the act, unless it appear that she did not so act. There is no provision in favour of the wife under such circumstances in the Penal Code.

PRACTICE.

Procedure. —Punishment.—The moral guilt of a person who commits a crime under compulsion is less than that of a person who commits it freely, but any effect which is thought proper may be given to this circumstance by a proportional mitigation of the offender's punishment.²²

95. Nothing is an offence by reason that it causes, or that it is intended to cause, or that it is known to be likely to cause, any harm, if that harm is so slight that no person of ordinary sense and temper¹ would complain of such harm.

COMMENT.

The maxim de minimis non curat lex (the law does not take account of trifles) is the foundation of this section.

Object.—The authors of the Code observe : “Clause 73 (this section) is intended to provide for those cases which, though, from the imperfections of language, they fall within the letter of the penal law, are yet not within its spirit, and are all over the world considered by the public, and for the most part dealt with by the tribunals, as innocent. As our definitions are framed, it is theft to dip a pen in another man’s ink, mischief to crumble one of his wafers, an assault to cover him with a cloud of dust by riding past him, hurt to incommode him by pressing against him in getting into a carriage. There are innumerable acts without performing which men cannot live together in society, acts which all men constantly do and suffer in turn, and which it is desirable that they should do and suffer in turn, yet which differ only in degree from crimes. That these acts ought not to be treated as crimes is evident; and we think it far better expressly to except them from the penal clauses of the Code than to leave it to the judges to except them in practice; for if the Code is silent on the subject, the judges can except these cases only by resorting to one of two practices which we consider as most pernicious, by making law, or by wresting the language of the law from its plain meaning.”²³

Scope.—This section has no application, unless the act in question amounts to an offence under the Code, but for the operation of this section. Where the accused who was ordered by his employers in Calcutta to take certain bags of papers and forms belonging to them to their yard to burn and destroy them, instead of doing that, took them to a place for sale, it was held that his act did not amount to criminal breach of trust and that this section had therefore no application.²⁴ The section has no application where the act charged against the accused person amounts to an offence irrespectively of whether he thereby caused, intended to cause, or knew himself to be likely to cause, harm. The accused was arrested under s. 131 of the Railways Act for being found in a state of intoxication on a railway station. The Magistrate discharged him on the ground that the harm done was so slight that “no notice would be taken of it under s. 95 of the Indian Penal Code beyond a mere warning.” It was held, on revision, that the accused should have been convicted because to be drunk upon any part of a railway was to commit an offence under s. 120A of the Railways Act, and the fact that he caused little or no annoyance to any one in particular could not exempt him from conviction under that section.²⁵

This section leaves unaffected the Madras Regulations (XII of 1816, s. 10 and IV of 1821, s. 6) as to trivial offences.

1. ‘Person of ordinary sense and temper.’—Such person must be taken from the class to which the complainant belongs.

CASES.

Acts causing slight harm.—Where a person took pods, almost valueless, from a tree standing on Government waste land;¹ where a person complained of the harm caused to his reputation by the imputation that he was travelling with a wrong ticket;² where a young woman, of questionable character, was going through a public thoroughfare to fetch water, and the accused caught hold of her hand, as a mere piece of foolish and vulgar chaff;³ where the accused was convicted of mischief for taking some earth of hardly any appreciable value from an open piece of ground;⁴ where a person removed a semi-decayed branch of a tamarind tree not belonging to him, and overhanging the roof of his house, because it inconvenienced him;⁵ where a barrister and a pleader were engaged in a case, and the latter made a remark conveying an imputation

A Deputy Magistrate went to a place to inquire into a petition made by the residents for funds to enable them to dig a well and in the course of a discussion with the people assembled, he remarked that as some of the residents were well-to-do men, they must make the well themselves, whereupon the accused who were present there said to the Deputy Magistrate: "Then why do you make an inquiry, go away quietly." operation of the penal clauses of the Code large classes of acts done in good faith for the purpose of repelling unlawful aggressions. In this part of the chapter we have attempted to define, with as much exactness as the subject appears to us to admit, the limits of the right of private defence. It may be thought that we have allowed too great a latitude to the exercise of this right; and we are ourselves of opinion that if we had been framing laws for a bold and high-spirited people, accustomed to take the law into their own hand, and to go beyond the line of moderation in repelling injury, it would have been fit to provide additional restrictions. In this country the danger is on the other side; the people are too little disposed to help themselves; the patience with which they submit to the cruel depredations of gang-robbers, and to trespass and mischief committed in the most outrageous manner by bands of ruffians, is one of the most remarkable, and at the same time one of the most discouraging symptoms which the state of society in India presents to us. Under these circumstances we are desirous rather to rouse and encourage a manly spirit among the people than to multiply restrictions on the exercise of the right of self-defence. We are of opinion that all the evil which is likely to arise from the abuse of that right is far less serious than the evil which would arise from the execution of one person for overstepping what might appear to the Courts to be the exact line of moderation in resisting a body of dacoits.²³

This right of defence is absolutely necessary. The vigilance of Magistrates can never make up for the vigilance of each individual on his own behalf. The fear of the law can never restrain bad men so effectually as the fear of the sum total of individual resistance. Take away this right and you become in so doing the accomplice of all bad men.²⁴ The law does not require a citizen, however law-abiding he may be, to behave like a rank coward on any occasion. The right of self-defence, as defined by law, must be fostered in the citizens of every free country. If a man is attacked he need not run away, and he would be perfectly justified in the eye of law if he holds his ground and delivers a counter-attack to his assailants provided always, that the injury which he inflicts in self-defence is not out of proportion to the injury with which he was threatened.²⁵

Scope.—There is no right of private defence under the Code against any act which is not in itself an offence under it.¹ An act done in exercise of the right of private defence is not an offence and does not, therefore, give rise to any right of private defence in return.²

The defence of possession either of goods or lands against a mere trespass, not a crime, does not, strictly speaking, justify even a breach of the peace.

Limitations.—The right is subject in all cases to the restriction contained in cls. 3 and 4 of s. 99.³

Aggression.—This right cannot be pleaded by persons who, believing they will be attacked, court the attack.⁴

PRACTICE.

Whether right of defence should be pleaded.—The accused must plead the right of defence. It is for those who raise this plea to prove it. If raised, a full account of the occurrence must be given in evidence.⁵ Because it is necessary that all the circumstances should be pleaded before a Court and the plea ought to be proved by satisfactory evidence.⁶ In a case the Allahabad High Court held that a Court ought not to set up such a plea when the accused himself has not done so.⁷ Subsequently it has held that even where a right of private defence is not pleaded, the Court, on finding on the evidence before it, that the accused acted in the exercise of his right of private defence, is bound to take cognizance of the fact.⁸ The Madras High Court has ruled that even if the accused does not specifically plead private defence, he may be acquitted if the evidence showed that he was acting in self-defence.⁹ In a Full Bench decision the Calcutta High Court has observed that it cannot be laid down as a general proposition of universal applicability that a Court cannot and should not consider a case in favour of the accused which he has not raised. If such a case arises on the prosecution evidence, it should be put to the jury for their consideration whatever line might have been taken by the accused or his counsel.¹⁰ Similarly, the Lahore High Court has held that when there is evidence proving that a person accused of killing or injuring another acted in the exercise of the right of private defence, the Court ought not to ignore that evidence and convict the accused merely because the latter set up a different defence and denied having committed the assault.¹¹

Where the right of private defence, or any other general exception, is pleaded by the accused and evidence is adduced to support such plea, but such evidence fails to satisfy the Court affirmatively of the existence of circumstances bringing the case within the general exception pleaded, the accused person is entitled to be acquitted if, upon a consideration of the evidence as a whole (including the evidence given in support of the plea of the said general exception) a reasonable doubt is created in the mind of the Court whether the accused person is or is not entitled to the benefit of the said exception. The presumption laid down in s. 105 of the Evidence act might come into play, but it does not follow therefrom that the accused must be convicted even when the reasonable doubt under the plea of right of private defence or any other general or special exception pervades the whole case. The Court, at the end of the trial, has still to see whether having regard to the entire evidence and the circumstances of the case the charge is proved beyond reasonable doubt.¹²

The right of an accused person to defend himself upon a criminal charge can only be limited by the provisions of the statute law. An accused person can set up an alternative inconsistent defence.¹³

An accused person who at his trial has not pleaded the right of private defence, but has raised other pleas inconsistent with such a defence, cannot in appeal set up a case, founded upon the evidence taken at his trial, that he acted in the exercise of the right of private defence; neither is the Court competent to raise such a plea on his behalf.¹⁴

The mere failure of the prosecution to account for the injuries sustained by the accused's party does not raise a presumption that the accused acted in the right of private defence.¹⁵

A plea of self-defence can be raised for the first time in appeal if facts on the record justify such a plea.¹⁶

Secondly.—The property, whether movable or immovable, of himself or of any other person², against any act which is an offence falling under the definition of theft³, robbery⁴, mischief⁵ or criminal trespass⁶, or which is an attempt⁷ to commit theft, robbery, mischief or criminal trespass.

COMMENT.

This section says what the extent of the right of defence is. Section 99 speaks of the limitations on the exercise of this right.

Scope.—This section is much wider than the English law. Under it even a stranger may defend the person or property of another person; whereas under the English law there must be some kind of relationship existing, such as that of master and servant or husband and wife or guardian and ward, before this right could be exercised on behalf of another. Under the English law a person has no right to commit an assault merely in defence of other persons.

As to the defence of property the section speaks of “theft and robbery” but not offences like “house-breaking” and “dacoity”. It, therefore, seems that the mention of “theft” must be taken to include all offences ejusdem generis. The same consideration applies to the mention of “mischief” and “criminal trespass.”

Where both sides take up arms and go into the open to indulge in a fight no question of the exercise of the right of self-defence arises and it is immaterial whether the fight is begun by one side or the other.¹⁷

1. ‘Any other person.’—“It is a noble movement of the heart, that indignation which kindles at the sight of the feeble injured by the strong. It is a noble movement which makes us forget our own danger at the first cry of distress. It concerns the public safety that every honest man should consider himself as the natural protector of every other.”¹⁸ The section embodies this principle and it provides that every person has a right to defend his body or the body of any other person.

A Full Bench of the Madras High Court has ruled that the right of private defence as laid down in ss. 96 to 105 enables the arrest of any person when he has not been guilty of an offence for which arrest without warrant is permitted (e.g., drunkenness), when the person arresting or confining has a genuine and reasonable apprehension that to allow the other to remain at large will endanger the person and property of others. Where, therefore, a village Magistrate arrested a drunken person whose conduct was at the time a grave danger to the public, it was held that he was not guilty of any offence.¹⁹

Cases.—Defence of person.—Where a person assisted by a friend retaliated severely on another, who trespassed into his house with the object of having intercourse with his wife, both were held to have committed no offence.²⁰ Where a person who had seized cattle which had been trespassing on his lands, gathered together a number of men to assist him in resisting an anticipated attempt to rescue the cattle; and a fight between the parties took place, in which several men on each side were killed and injured, it was held that the person who had seized the cattle and his party were protected by this section.²¹ On being falsely informed that certain stolen property was in the possession of one P, a Sub-Inspector proceeded with a constable to P’s house with the object of making a search. On his arrival, he demanded the said property from P’s wife. She repudiated all knowledge of it and told him that her husband would be back shortly. He, however, declined to wait for P’s return, but began to threaten the woman with a cane and laid hands on her. On her cries, accused (P’s cousin) ran to her help. An altercation ensued and, ultimately, the accused, on being assaulted by the Sub-Inspector and the constable, snatched a heavy stick from the latter and struck two blows on the forehead of the Sub-Inspector which proved fatal. It was held that the accused had a right of self-defence against the dual assault on his person.²² Where the accused was attacked by a number of men armed with various weapons, snatched away a weapon from one of them and struck him with the weapon causing his death, it was held that the accused had a right of private defence of body although at the time the deceased man was unarmed.²³ Where lathi (club) blows were showered upon a person, it was held that he was justified in striking his adversaries with a spear.²⁴ Where a boy raised a cloud of dust causing injury to passers-by and the accused who was one of them chastised the boy, it was held that the accused had acted in the exercise of the right of private defence.²⁵

English case.—Under circumstances which might have induced the belief that a man was cutting the throat of his wife, their son shot and killed his father. It was held that if the son had reasonable grounds for believing and honestly believed that his act was necessary for the defence of his mother, the homicide was excusable.¹

2. 'Movable or immovable property, of himself or of any other person.'—

The right of private defence of property only comes into operation when certain specified offences against property are committed or attempted to be committed. It extends not only to one's own property but also to the property of any other person. It is not necessary that one of the offences enumerated in the section should have been actually committed, it is enough if there is an attempt to commit any of those offences.² A party in possession of land is legally entitled to defend his possession against another party seeking to eject him by force;³ or to steal from it,⁴ or to do an act which will have the effect of causing injury to it, e.g., by cutting a bund.⁵ It is immaterial whether the person in possession of the property had or had not the right of possession. If a zamindar's people enter upon crops with the intention of distraining without notice, the ryot-owners are justified in considering such action as trespass.⁶ But mere persistence in demanding rent will not amount to trespass so as to justify an assault on the person making the demand.⁷ A landlord who had not tendered to his tenant such a lease as the latter was bound to accept under the Madras Rent Recovery Act (Mad. Act VIII of 1865), distrained his cattle for arrears of rent, the assistance of the police having been procured for the purpose. The tenant, with the assistance of eleven other persons, forcibly obstructed the removal of the cattle which had already been actually seized and driven for some yards. It was held that the tenants were not entitled to the right of defence and were guilty of rioting.⁸ Although an attachment of property made by an amin and his party under a time-expired warrant of attachment is illegal, such attachment does not amount to an offence of theft or robbery, there being no dishonest intention of causing wrongful gain or wrongful loss to any person; and no question of mischief or criminal trespass arises in such a case. Therefore, upon such attachment there is no right of private defence of property.⁹

In order to establish the right of private defence of property, it is not necessary for the accused to prove his possession affirmatively; he can rely on the presumption of continuance of possession arising in his favour from the circumstances of the case.¹⁰ When a person takes or attempts to take any property belonging to him out of the possession of another who has no right to it, he has no dishonest intention and neither commits nor attempts to commit an offence, and persons assaulting him are not entitled to plead that they acted in the exercise of the right of private defence of property.¹¹

When an attack is made on persons acting in the lawful exercise of their right over property, they are entitled to the right of private defence, and the only question that arises thereafter is whether any member of the party individually exceeded the right. Persons exercising their lawful rights are not members of an unlawful assembly, nor can the assembly become unlawful by their repelling an attack made on them by persons who had no right to obstruct them, nor by exceeding the lawful use of their right of private defence. In such a case each is liable only for his individual acts

done in excess of such right.¹² The right of private defence is not limited to persons who are entitled to possession, but extends to such other persons as they may have gathered there to help them to protect their rights.¹³

3. 'Theft'.—See s. 378, infra. An illegal seizure of cattle with a view to impound them is theft and persons attempting to resist the seizure by force act in the exercise of the right of private defence of property and are as such entitled to the protection afforded by this section.¹⁴ Where a number of persons were justified in resisting the theft of their crops they could not all be considered as members of an unlawful assembly with the common object of asserting a right to the land on which the crops stood, because some of their number exceeded the right of private defence. But, if after some of them had exceeded the right of private defence, others continued in the assembly aiding and abetting them, they could all be considered members of an unlawful assembly.¹⁵ An illegal seizure of cattle with a view to impound them is theft and persons attempting to resist the seizure by force act in the exercise of the right of private defence of property and are as such entitled to the protection afforded by this section.¹⁶

4. 'Robbery'.—See s. 390, infra.

5. 'Mischief'.—See s. 425, infra.

6. 'Criminal trespass'.—See s. 441, infra. A rightful owner is entitled to physically turn out a trespasser or one trying to infringe upon his rights. A person exercising this right should, however, not use more force than is reasonable to defend his possession from a trespasser.¹⁷ A person in possession of lands is, however, not justified in confining persons who commit trespass.¹⁸

"A civil trespass will not excuse the firing a pistol at a trespasser in sudden resentment or anger. If a person takes forcible possession of another man's close, so as to be guilty of a breach of the peace, it is more than a trespass. So, if a man with force invades and enters into the dwelling of another. But a man is not authorized to fire a pistol on every intrusion or invasion of his house. He ought, if he has a reasonable opportunity, to endeavour to remove him without having recourse to the last extremity. But, the making an attack upon a dwelling, and especially at night, the law regards as equivalent to an assault on a man's person; for a man's house is his castle, and therefore, in the eye of the law, it is equivalent to an assault; but no words or singing are equivalent to an assault, nor will they authorize an assault in return."¹⁹

The auction purchaser does not commit any criminal act in going to assert his title and to take possession of the property purchased by him by ousting the judgment debtor, who became a trespasser after the date of delivery of possession.²⁰

Where the common intention of an assembly of more than five persons was to resist by force an unlawful trespass on land it was held that they were not guilty of rioting.²¹

Cases.—Defence of property.—Plea allowed.—The villagers belonging to C walked in a religious procession, through a part of the village of K, carrying with them a vessel containing water which purported to be consecrated. The villagers of K, objecting, obstructed the procession, whereupon the members of it resisted the obstruction, and used some violence, causing grievous hurt to one of the obstructers and hurt to two others of them. It was held that they were justified in exercising their right of private defence of body and property and the harm inflicted was not more than necessary for the purpose of self defence.²² Where persons, who actually grew the disputed crop and who were no parties either to the civil suit for possession which was decreed against their landlord, or to the delivery of possession of the land, resisted the action of the complainant who went to take possession under the decree of the civil Court, it was held that they were justified in claiming what they had grown and in resisting the complainant.²³ Where cattle belonging to the complainant trespassed on to the land of the accused, who seized the cattle and were driving them to the pound when the complainant's party arrived and attempted to rescue the cattle from the accused and in doing so the complainant's party used violence and succeeded in rescuing some of the cattle, and thereupon the accused resisted the action of the complainant's party and in attempting to defend themselves against the violence used by the complainant's party, caused injuries to several members of that party, some of which amounted to grievous hurt, it was held that the accused were legally entitled to take the cattle to the pound and that the action of the complainant's party in attempting to rescue cattle was unlawful and that the accused had, therefore, the right of private defence against the acts of the complainant's party and where it could not be said under the circumstances that the accused had exceeded that right they were not guilty of any offence.²⁴ The owner of cattle was held to have a right to protect his cattle which were being wrongfully taken away, and is not guilty of any offence, if he uses force in the exercise of the right of private defence in getting the cattle released.²⁵ Where a tree was blown down by wind and the owner of it entered into his tenant's land to remove it, it was held that he had a right of private defence of property in the fallen tree and had therefore a right of ingress over the tenant's land.¹

Criminal trespass.—A police-officer attempted to carry on a general search for stolen property (not authorized by law). One of the accused in resisting such a search pushed the Sub-Inspector and the latter ordered two constables to climb on his roof and break into the house, whereupon the villagers assumed a threatening attitude and threatened to cut them to pieces if they entered the house and this empty threat was sufficient to prevent the police from committing the trespass. It was held that the accused were justified in resisting the search, and they had not exceeded the right of private defence.²

Plea disallowed.—The accused was out in the jungle with his gun; an altercation took place between him and the deceased, the former interfering to prevent the latter from committing real or supposed cattle trespass; the deceased thereupon with a large club attacked the accused, who fired without any particular aim, but lowering the muzzle of the gun so as not to hit a vital part, and death ultimately resulted from the wound thus inflicted. It was held that the accused's act was not a legal exercise of the right of private defence, as he had only to stand back and he was safe.³ Where an amin with a party of constables, mukhia and patwari went to a village to make an attachment, but the warrant had become invalid by lapse of the time limited thereby, and the owner of the property resisted and caused grievous hurt to one of the party, it was held that he could not plead any right of private defence of property and was rightly convicted under s. 326.⁴ Where there is a spontaneous fight between two parties each individual is responsible for the injuries he causes himself and for the probable consequences of the pursuit by his party of their common object. He cannot plead that because he might at any moment be struck by some member of the other party, his own blows were given in self-defence.⁵ The complainant, having purchased land from a vendor, went to plough the field, which was unoccupied. The accused opposed the complainant's party, one of the accused claiming the land. On objection by the complainant the accused's party made a violent attack with deadly weapons resulting in the death of three persons of the complainant's party. It was held that the accused had no right of private defence as the object with which the accused persons took the law into their own hands was not to prevent either theft or mischief but to enforce their own right or supposed right to the land.⁶

Altercation between two parties.—Where the primary object of both parties is to fight and the vindication of their right to property is merely a pretext, no question of self-defence can arise.⁷ Party A sowed a crop in a field to which apparently they were entitled. Party B, claiming the field and the crop as theirs, entered upon the land and began to cut the crop. Party A, having watched party B enter upon the land, took counsel together and then proceeded to attack party B, and a fight ensued, in which grievous hurt was caused. It was held that it was not open to party A to plead that they were acting in the exercise of their right of private defence of property.⁸ This case does not lay down sound law. The finding of possession and sowing of the crops on the part of A brings the case under this section subject to s. 99. The taking of counsel before action will not by itself deprive the accused of his right of private defence. It is not found that there was time to have recourse to the authorities. This case is not supported by *Q. E. v. Prag Dat*⁹ though it professes to follow that case; and is directly in conflict with Q. E. v. Narsang Pathabhai,¹⁰ *Pachkauri v. Q. E.*¹¹ and *K. E. v. Ayya Annasamy Aiyar*¹² and has not been referred to in Emp. v. Hira.¹³ In the last case certain persons who were lawfully in possession, as tenants of agricultural land, having reason to suppose that it was possible that they might be attacked and ejected from the land by force, made a practice of keeping their clubs in readiness, and also persuaded the tenants of some adjacent fields to do likewise. The expected attack came, and there was a somewhat severe fight, in the course of which both parties were injured. It was held that the defenders were within their rights in holding themselves in readiness to repel an attack if and when it should come.

The accused went with three ploughs on the land to which the complainant had the right of possession, and of which he was in possession till such entry, and began to plough up the land, to uproot some castor plants and throw them away. While they were thus in actual but temporary occupation, the complainant and his party went on the land and tried to yoke the cattle, whereupon a riot took place. It was held that the accused were not justified in entering on the land, in ploughing it, uprooting the plants and throwing them away, that they were members of an unlawful assembly, the common object of which was to enforce a right or supposed right for the exercise of which they were prepared to use force, and that their action in beating the complainant's party was not justified by the fact of their having obtained temporary occupation.¹⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Burden of proof.—The burden of proof is upon the accused to justify his plea of right of private defence, and in the case of right of private defence of property, he must prove that it was his property.¹⁵

A mere statement by the accused that the other party wounded them is not the same as to say that they struck the opposite party in the exercise of the right of private defence. In order to establish the exercise of the right of private defence it is absolutely necessary to detail the exact circumstances which led them to strike the blow in question.¹⁶

When an accused person commits an act of violence upon another person in circumstances which prove that he is apprehending further violence from that person, nothing further need be proved to establish that the accused is acting in the exercise of his right of private defence. Accordingly where the deceased struck the accused with a stick and was prepared to strike him a second time and the accused took out his knife and stabbed the deceased, it is wrong to throw upon the accused the burden of proving that he had in fact consciously exercised his right of self-defence when he used his knife.¹⁷

When an act, which would otherwise be a certain offence, is not that offence, by reason of the youth,¹ the want of maturity of understanding,² the unsoundness of mind,³ or the intoxication⁴ of the person doing that act, or by reason of any misconception⁵ on the part of that person, every person has the same right of private defence against that act which he would have if the act were that offence.

COMMENT.

This section lays down that for the purpose of exercising the right of private defence physical or mental incapacity of the person against whom the right is exercised is no bar.

Acts against which there is no right of private defence.

There is no right of private defence against an act which does not reasonably cause the apprehension of death or of grievous hurt, if done, or attempted to be done, by the direction of a public servant acting in good faith under colour of his office though that direction may not be strictly justifiable by law.²

There is no right of private defence in cases in which there is time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities.³

The right of private defence in no case extends to the inflicting of more harm than it is necessary to inflict for the purpose of defence.⁴

Extent to which the right may be exercised.

Explanation 1.—A person is not deprived of the right of private defence against an act done, or attempted to be done, by a public servant, as such, unless he knows, or has reason to believe, that the person doing the act is such public servant.

Explanation 2.—A person is not deprived of the right of private defence against an act done, or attempted to be done, by the direction of a public servant, unless he knows, or has reason to believe, that the person doing the act is acting by such direction, or unless such person states the authority under which he acts, or if he has authority in writing, unless he produces such authority, if demanded.

COMMENT.

This section enumerates the limitations put on the exercise of the right of defence.

1. First clause.—This clause applies to those cases in which the public servant is acting (1) in good faith, and (2) under colour of his office, though the particular act being done by him may not be strictly justifiable by law.

This clause protects a public servant against the right of private defence even if the authority be defective in minor particulars or even if the officer exceeds his duty in a minor particular, and it merely leaves the right of private defence open when the alleged authority is no authority at all and is wholly defective in form or the officer goes clearly and widely outside the duties imposed on him. Even in such cases, where the right of private defence is open, it is not lawful for any person to offer to the public servant more violence than is strictly necessary to resist the unlawful act and that if the authority has no defect, the section has no operation.¹⁸

This clause was enacted to meet cases which would not fall within s. 332 by reason of the public servant not being at the time when the assault was committed on him in discharge of a duty imposed on him by law. It applies to those cases in which the public servant is acting in good faith under colour of his office, though the particular act being done by him may not be justifiable by law.¹⁹ Where a police-officer acting bona fide under colour of his office arrests a person but without authority, the person so arrested has no right of self-defence against the officer.²⁰

'An act which does not reasonably cause the apprehension of death or of grievous hurt.'—The right of private defence against an injury apprehended to be done by public servant extends only to those cases in which there is a reasonable cause of apprehension of death or of grievous hurt being caused by the act of such public servant.²¹ An Excise Inspector pursued an armed smuggler, and on coming up with him ordered him to stop and fired his revolver twice to frighten him, whereupon the smuggler drew a sword and cut the Inspector on the thigh. It was held that the smuggler had reasonable ground for believing that the Inspector intended to cause death or grievous hurt and did not exceed the right of private defence.²²

'Grievous hurt.'—See s. 320, infra. 'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra.

'Good faith.'—See s. 52, supra.²³ An officer of the Court who acts under a time-expired warrant and attaches property cannot be deemed to have acted in good faith;²⁴ nor can he be deemed to have so acted, where he arrests a woman without informing her that the warrant was a bailable one and deliberately refuses to give her an opportunity of giving bail;²⁵ or where he orders a person other than the one named in the warrant to execute it.¹ Where a senior police-officer effects a search without compliance with the safe-guards incorporated in s. 165, Criminal Procedure Code, he cannot be said to be acting in good faith within the meaning of this section.²

'Under colour of his office.'—The protection is intended to be given only to a public servant acting honestly in the legitimate discharge of powers conferred or of duties imposed upon him. Certain customs officials on search found that goods were smuggled from Yanam into British territory. The smugglers in the course of the search attacked the officials and caused injuries. They contended that the customs officials had not the power to stop or search because there was no notification declaring Yanam to be foreign territory under s. 5 of the Indian Tariff Act. It was held that the customs officers were entitled to stop, search and seize goods which were brought in British India without payment of duty, and that, even if there was no notification, the customs officers must be deemed to have acted in good faith under colour of their office and that no right of private defence arose.³

'Not strictly justifiable by law.'—This section has no application to a case where the initial proceeding, and the power under which any public servant purports to act are altogether without jurisdiction,⁴ and entirely ultra vires.⁵ The word 'strictly' has been deliberately inserted by the Legislature to show that the section was not intended to apply to cases where the act was wholly unjustified. It does not extend to cases where there is a complete want of jurisdiction.⁶ The protection afforded under it to public servants is not lost to them by reason of any mistake on their part in the exercise of their proper functions.⁷ The section thus applies to cases where there is an excess of jurisdiction as distinct from a complete absence of jurisdiction, to cases where the official has done wrongly what he might have done rightly, but not to cases where the act would not possibly have been done rightly.⁸ An act which is the very contrary of the duties of a public servant cannot be said to be done by a public servant while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duties.⁹ Thus resistance to the execution of an illegal warrant is justifiable in exercise of the right of private defence.¹⁰ Resistance to a general search for stolen property is justifiable as the law requires the mention of specific things.¹¹

Cases.—Resistance to officer acting without warrant.—A police-officer attempted without a search-warrant to enter into a house in search of property alleged to have been stolen, and was obstructed and resisted. It was held that, even though the officer was not strictly justified in searching the house without a warrant, the person obstructing and resisting could not set up the illegality of the officer's proceeding as a justification of his obstruction, as it was not shown that the officer was acting otherwise than in good faith and without malice.¹² The Patna High Court has held that a police-officer holding search without written authority is not acting either in good faith or under colour of his office. Resistance to such officer is not illegal as such a search is without jurisdiction.¹³

Resistance to illegal search.—A riot took place while a police-officer was searching the house of one of the accused outside the police-officer's limits. In the course of the riot the police-officer and his party were beaten, the property already attached by him was lost, and a person arrested by him disappeared. The object of the riot was to prevent the search, and not the taking of the property or the release of the prisoner. It was held that the police-officer having made the search in good faith and under colour of his office, the accused could not plead a right of private defence and that, if they had any such right, they had exceeded it and were guilty of offences of riot and hurt.¹⁴ Where the search proposed to be made by a Sub-Inspector of Police was not strictly in accordance with s. 165 of the Criminal Procedure Code, he could not be said to have acted in good faith and the accused who pushed him in order to prevent the search was held to have committed no offence.¹⁵

Resistance to acting on illegal warrant or order or acting illegally.—A warrant was issued by a Magistrate for the arrest of one D under s. 114 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The warrant was sent to a certain thana to be executed. It was there, after being copied into a book kept for that purpose at the thana, made over to a particular constable for execution. When the constable to whom the warrant had been made over had left the thana, it was discovered that D was in a village other than that in which he had been supposed to be. Thereupon the officer temporarily in charge of the thana made a copy from the book at the thana, endorsed on the back the names of one N and some other constables, and, having signed the endorsement, sent N and the others out with this paper to arrest D. N and his companions arrested D; but, as they were returning with him in custody, some of D's friends, aided by D himself, attacked them, rescued D and caused hurt to the police. It was held that the police-officer concerned in arresting D under the circumstances above described were not acting in the lawful discharge of their duty within the meaning of s. 332 of the Penal Code, so as to render the accused liable to conviction under that section; but, inasmuch as they were acting in good faith under colour of their office, this section applied, and D and his associates might be properly convicted under ss. 147 and 323 of the Code.¹⁶ Where, on the complaint of one G that his wife was wrongfully confined by his father-in-law, a warrant was issued under s. 96, Criminal Procedure Code, and the police, attempting to execute this warrant at the house of the father-in-law, was obstructed by him and seven others who used also criminal force, it was held that as the warrant issued was wholly illegal, the accused were not deprived of the right of private defence.¹⁷ Where the accused was convicted of having assaulted a peon when executing a writ of delivery of possession of a share in a tank by ordering some fishermen to cast their nets in the tank and catch fish for the decree-holder as provided in the writ, it was held that whatever mistake there might be in the procedure of the Munsif in giving the direction in the writ, the accused had no right of private defence against the peon who was a public servant acting under colour of his office in good faith.¹⁸ Where an income-tax officer having entered the accused's factory for examination of their accounts refused to leave it and sent for a police-officer on their refusal to show him their accounts and was therefore forcibly ejected by them, it was held that this section did not deprive the accused of their right of private defence as the proceedings of the officer were wholly illegal and he was not acting in good faith under colour of his office.¹⁹ A police-officer, finding one of the accused at night time carrying a long-handled hatchet, and suspecting him to be on his way to kill a certain person with whom he had enmity, demanded the hatchet and on refusal attempted to snatch it from the accused. The latter called two others and the police-officer was assaulted by three men, grievous hurt being inflicted upon him. It was held that a hatchet, not being a weapon the possession of which without a license is forbidden by law, the action of the police-officer was wholly without jurisdiction and therefore this section was not applicable.²⁰ Where certain peons forcibly seized for military purposes a bullock cart not let on hire, and a scuffle ensued and one of the peons was hurt by the cartman, it was held that the latter acted in the exercise of his right of private defence, because the peons had no legal authority to take the cart in their charge by criminal force and without his consent, and thus their act being one not done under colour of their office, this section did not apply.²¹ Where an order of the Superintendent of Police for the arrest of the accused was illegal and the constables who sought to arrest them were armed with lathis, it was held that the accused were justified in resisting their arrest and in causing hurt to the constables in the exercise of their right of private defence against unlawful arrest.²²

Illegal attachment.—Where articles protected from attachment were attached, it was held that this act did not justify resistance.²³ Where the property of a person was wrongfully attached as the property of certain absconders, it was held that the rightful owner had no right of private defence of his property, as the police-officer was acting in good faith under colour of his office, and that even supposing the order of attachment might not have been properly made, that would in itself be no sufficient ground for such a defence.²⁴ This decision seems questionable. There is no right of private defence if the proceedings of a public officer are not "strictly justifiable by law." But in this case the action of the police-officer was entirely ultra vires as the property in question did not belong to the absconders, and there is no room left for the operation of the first two clauses of this section. See Q. E. v. Tulsiram,²⁵ Jagarnath Mandhata v. Q. E.,¹ Q. E. v. Jogendra Nath Mukerjee.²

Illegal arrest.—Where a constable effected an arrest under colour of his office, it was held that there was no right of private defence against him even though the arrest was not strictly justifiable by law.³

Act done without jurisdiction.—A Magistrate has no jurisdiction to issue an order under s. 144, Criminal Procedure Code, in favour of any person and ask the police to allow him to cut the crops, without making any inquiry as to who was in possession of the lands, and the third party, whose possession is found, has a right of private defence of property and that party is not deprived of that right simply because the police were there armed with an illegal and unjustifiable order of the Magistrate.⁴ Where movable property was attached in execution of a civil Court decree and removed by a peon of the Court from the house of the accused contrary to certain High Court Circulars, and subsequently it was taken away by the accused, it was held that this section was not a bar to the exercise of the right of private defence of property as the removal was illegal.⁵

2. Second clause.—The first clause speaks of acts done by a public servant, this clause, of acts done under the direction of a public servant. Under this clause it is not necessary that the doer should be a public servant. He must only act under the directions of a public servant. Explanation 2 must be read conjointly with this clause. Notwithstanding this clause, a person can resist a public servant if the latter's conduct is altogether illegal. Thus, where a licensed vaccinator unlawfully attempted to take lymph from the arm of a person who objected to it, it was held that the resistance was justifiable.⁶

Cases.—Resistance to execution of warrant.—Where a police-officer attempted to execute a warrant, the issue of which was illegal, it was held that the accused were justified in their resistance.⁷ It was held similarly where a constable conducted a search without any authority.⁸ Where the warrant issued for the arrest of a debtor was initialled though not fully signed, it was held that he had no right of private defence.⁹

Resistance to execution of not strictly legal order.—An order to the police purporting to be made under s. 145, Criminal Procedure Code, directing them to take charge of some crops in dispute, was not strictly legal, and in execution of such order the police went to the spot where the crop was stored and after announcing the order proposed to guard it. It was held that the accused in seizing several men of the police party and carrying them off into confinement had exceeded their right of private defence.¹⁰ Resistance to a search conducted without any authority is justifiable.¹¹

3. Third clause.—This clause must be read with the first clause of s. 105.¹² It places an important restriction on the exercise of the right of private defence.

'Time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities.'—No man has the right to take the law into his own hands for the protection of his person or property, if there is reasonable opportunity of redress by recourse to the public authorities. The right of self-help, when it causes or is likely to cause damage to the person or property of another person, must be restricted and recourse to the public authorities must be insisted on. If a person prefers to use force in order to protect his property when he could, for the protection of such property, easily have recourse to the public authorities, his use of force is made punishable.¹³ The natural tendency of the law of all civilised States is to restrict within constantly narrowing limits the right of self-help and it is certain that no other principle can be safely applied to a country like India.¹⁴

There is no right of private defence where two parties arm themselves for a fight to enforce their right or supposed right, and deliberately engage in large numbers in a fight. In such a case, if it is not shown that the accused were acting within the legal limits of the right of private defence, it does not matter which party was the first to attack.¹⁵ The right of private defence being granted for defence only, it must not and cannot legally be exercised when there is 'time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities.' This does not mean that a person in actual possession is, when attacked, to abandon his property to the mercy of the marauders, with a view of making an application to the police for assistance.¹⁶ The law must not be invoked to oppress persons who, when there is no time to have recourse to the public authorities, find themselves in a position in which they must either exercise the privilege of private defence—as provided and restricted by the law or submit to a forcible invasion of the right of person or property in cases where, under s. 97, the law does not require any such submission.¹⁷ At the same time the right of private defence does not take the place of the functions of those public servants who are especially charged with the protection of life and property and the apprehension of offenders, and where the assistance of the public authorities can be procured, the right cannot be lawfully exercised.

The right of private defence of property commences when a reasonable apprehension of danger to the property commences. Before such apprehension commences, the owner of the property is not called upon to apply for protection to the public authorities. The apprehension which justifies a recourse to the authorities ought to be based on some information of a definite kind as to the time and place of the danger actually threatened.¹⁸

Where a person is attacked while doing a lawful act, he is entitled to stand his ground and defend himself, and the law does not intend that he must run away to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities.¹⁹ There is no obligation upon a person entitled to exercise the right of private defence and to defend his person or property, to retire merely because his assailant threatens him with violence.²⁰ He has the right to defend himself.²¹ But where the accused is not doing a lawful act and is himself the aggressor and commences the beating of his assailants he is not entitled to claim the right of private defence.²²

It has been rightly said by the Madras High Court that the view that a person should not exercise his right of self-defence if by running away he can avoid injury from his assailant, places a greater restriction on the right of private defence of the body than the law requires. The extent to which the exercise of the right will be justified will depend not on the actual danger but on whether there was reasonable apprehension of such danger.²³ It never was intended that a man should submit to the deprivation of property in his possession without exercising any right of self-defence, and trust to recover it by the tedious operation of a case in the civil Court with all the weight of possession, onus of proof, etc., against him.²⁴ A rightful owner has a right to eject a trespasser from his land by civil process, but it is not within his right to take a mob of men and forcibly eject the person in possession of the land in respect of which he had only title without possession. The right of private defence does not cover a case of taking or retaking possession by means of criminal force or show of criminal force.²⁵ There are circumstances in which one can collect a mob expecting resistance with violence from his opponent and defend his property by violent means and can still get the benefit of the right of private defence. Those circumstances must be (1) immediate danger to the property, which if not immediately protected, would be lost by the time protection of public authorities is obtained, (2) even this justified violence by the mob for protection of property from actual invasion should be exercised within the legal limits of the right of private defence of person or property, that is to say, there must be circumstances existing leading to a reasonable apprehension of danger arising out of a committed or attempted or threatened offence affecting person or property, as the case may be, justifying the particular injury inflicted.¹

Cases.—Time to obtain protection of public authorities.—Where the servants of an indigo factory having been interfered with by the villagers to sow land, went out in force to effect their purpose and the villagers also went out armed to meet them, it was held that in the affray followed neither party could plead the right of private defence of property as there was a police-station near at hand.² The accused numbering from forty to sixty, armed with clubs, spears and heavy billets of wood, proceeded to the disputed land, attacked the complainant and his father, and destroyed the crops growing thereon. Both parties claimed the land as having fallen to their shares on partition. The Magistrate found that the complainant was in possession and had grown the crops. It was held that the right of private defence did not arise, as there was no invasion of the accused's rights on the day of occurrence, and, in any case, that they had ample time to have recourse to the authorities for the protection of their rights.³ The accused made a combined attack upon M and R as they were throwing earth upon a narrow path of the shamilat and in so doing threw earth upon the fences with which the accused had formed enclosures upon the shamilat. The injury caused to R was not serious but M died of the blow caused by one of the accused. It was held that as the matter was not urgent and no serious loss of property was threatened and there was ample time to have recourse to authorities the accused who made a combined attack were guilty under ss. 323, 325 and 149.⁴ Where the accused was being arrested even though unlawfully, for the purpose of being produced before the police authorities, he could have no reasonable apprehension that he will be unable to have recourse to the public authorities for his release, the right of private defence did not give the accused a right to use such force as might cause death.⁵

No time to obtain protection of public authorities.—The accused received information, one evening that the complainants intended to go on his land on the following day, and uproot the javari seed sown in it. At about three o'clock next morning he was informed that the complainants had entered on his land, and were ploughing up the seed. Thereupon he at once proceeded to the spot, followed by the remaining accused, and remonstrated with the complainants who commenced an attack on the accused. In the fight which ensued, both sides received serious injuries, and the leader of the complainants' party was killed. It was held that the complainants being the aggressors, the accused had the right of private defence; and that they were not bound to act on the information received on the previous evening, and seek the protection of the public authorities, as they had no reason to apprehend a night attack on their property.⁶ Where the opponents of the accused erected some huts stealthily at night on a plot of land of which the accused were in peaceful possession and it was alleged that the opponents were in possession of the land for about fourteen hours, and the accused at break of day on coming to know of this took the earliest opportunity to exercise their own right of private defence and came to the spot armed to turn out the opponents who were found by them still engaged in erecting more huts and there was a free fight between the parties and the accused did not inflict more hurt than was necessary for defending themselves, it was held that the accused were not guilty of rioting as they were entitled to their right of private defence.⁷ Where a person who had seized cattle which had been trespassing on his lands, gathered together a number of men to assist him in resisting an anticipated attempt to rescue the cattle, and a fight between the parties took place, in which several men on each side were killed and injured, it was held that the person who had seized the cattle and his party had not exceeded the right of private defence.⁸ Accused received information that they were about to be attacked by a hostile section in the village. They believed that if they separated they would be pursued and attacked individually and under this belief they collected together and awaited the attack. Their enemies then appeared on the scene and one of them fired a pistol and hit one of the accused. One of the accused then fired a pistol and hit the man who had first fired, and then a fight with lathis commenced during the course of which one member of each party was killed. It was held that the accused were entitled to exercise the right of private defence and it could not be said that they had exceeded that right.⁹ Where in a faction fight, a large crowd, belonging to one faction, attacked the accused's house at dead of night with hired rowdies armed with sticks and knives in order to wreak vengeance on the accused, destroyed his valuable properties, and made his wife and sons fly away from the house by the back door and the accused bolted himself into the house which was attacked and having a gun and a large supply of ammunition fired at the crowd through a small window and killed three persons therein, it was held that the accused did not exceed his right of self-defence and was not guilty of any offence.¹⁰

4. Fourth clause.—In the case of injuring another in self-defence, there must be two things : there must be no more harm inflicted than is necessary for the purpose of defence, and there must be a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body from the attempt or threat to commit some offence; and the right does not commence until there is the reasonable apprehension. Thus, the firing of a gun at persons at a distance of twenty-five yards, without a reasonable apprehension of danger, and without any necessity for so doing, is not justifiable by the right of private defence.¹¹ The amount of force necessary depends on the circumstances of the case, and there is no protection if the harm is caused by excessive violence quite unnecessary to the case.¹² For example, a person set by his master to watch a garden or yard, is not at all justified in shooting at or injuring, in any way, persons who may come into those premises, even in the night. He ought first to see whether he could not take measures for their apprehension.¹³ A kick is not a justifiable mode of turning a man out of your house, though he be a trespasser. If a person becomes excited and gives another a kick, it is an unjustifiable act.¹⁴ At the same time when exercising the right of private defence, it is difficult to expect a person to weigh "with golden scales" what maximum amount of force is necessary to keep within the right.¹⁵ A person who is assaulted is not bound to modulate his defence step by step according to the attack. Where the attack has assumed a dangerous form every allowance should be made for the person defending himself if he, with the instinct of self-preservation strong upon him, pursues his defence a little further than may be strictly necessary in the circumstances to avert the attack.¹⁶

If the accused are justified in resisting the theft of their crops, they cannot be considered as members of an unlawful assembly, with the common object to assert a right to the disputed land and crops, because some members thereof may have exceeded the right of private defence; but if some of the members continue in it, after the others have exceeded the right by the infliction of unnecessary violence, and aid and abet the latter, they also must be considered as having exceeded the right.¹⁷ In deciding whether or not an accused has exceeded his right of private defence, regard must be had to the comparative physical strength of the accused and the deceased respectively and also to the antecedents of the deceased and his conduct on the occasion.¹⁸

Cases.—Justifiable harm.—Where the accused finding a thief entering into his house at night, through an entrance made in the side-wall, seized him while intruding his body and held him with his face down to the ground to prevent his further entrance and thereby caused his death by suffocation;¹⁹ where a person attacked by another with a spear struck a blow with a club which resulted in the death of the party attacking;²⁰ where a boy whose crop was frequently stolen found a person stealing and gave him some blows with a club which resulted in his death;²¹ where a number of armed men attacked a court-house, and one of the inmates shot an assailant;²² where the accused fired his gun against persons whom he thought to be his enemies entering into the house at dead of night whereas they were policemen who had come to arrest him and a policeman was killed;²³ the right of private defence was held to be a good justification.

Where the tenants were found to have held their lands under a system, under which harvested crops were to be taken to the village khalihan (threshing place), but it appeared that they went in a large body armed with clubs with the avowed intention of removing them to their own houses, and were making up the crops already cut into bundles, whereupon the zemindar's watchmen remonstrated and a number of their men went to the spot armed with clubs and swords and a fight took place, owing to the interference of the leader of the tenants, in the course of which some of the tenants received slight incised wounds and one of them a severe one inflicted by one of the accused, and where it further appeared that the zemindar's people had, four days before the date of the occurrence, sent an urgent appeal to the police for protection against a serious breach of the peace which seemed imminent, it was held that inasmuch as the common object of the accused was to protect the zamindar's rights over the crops, and there was no specific finding by the Sessions Judge that their intention was to use more force than was necessary or that they had in fact used excessive force, they acted in the exercise of the right of private defence and were not guilty of rioting.²⁴ In the course of a family quarrel between a brother and sister, as to possession of a store room, the sister was roughly handled and on hearing her cry out for help, the husband who was working close by turned up and finding the wife being assaulted by her brother and another and her hands cut and bruised, struck the brother one deadly blow with an instrument and on himself being attacked by the other man, dealt another fatal blow to him also. was held that the accused had reason to suppose that his wife might be severely injured and the blows struck by him on both the men were in exercise of the right of defence of his wife and himself.²⁵

More harm caused than necessary.—Where a person killed a weak old woman found stealing at night;¹ where a person caught a thief in his house at night and deliberately killed him with a pickaxe to prevent his escaping;² where the deceased attempted to take a pickaxe from the accused and the latter resisting struck him with it and killed him;³ where a number of persons apprehending a thief committing house-breaking strangled him and subjected him to gross maltreatment when he was fully in their power and helpless;⁴ where the accused fired a gun at persons at a distance of twenty-five yards without a reasonable apprehension of danger, and injured them;⁵ and where the accused armed with spears attacked and killed two persons unarmed who were ploughing a field believed by the accused to be their field;⁶ the right of private defence was negatived.⁷ Where a body of about ten men, belonging to the decrec-holder's party, went with Court officers upon a plot of land in the joint possession of the judgment-debtors to take symbolical possession thereof, and the drummer was assaulted by one of the latter, whereupon the accused and their party replied by an attack on their opponents, during the course of which one of the accused's party fractured the skull of the drummer's assailant by an isolated act, but the accused continued to beat him after he had fallen helpless on the ground, it was held that the accused had a right of private defence under the circumstances, but having exceeded such right by beating the wounded man after he had fallen, they were guilty of hurt.⁸ Where A trespassed on the lands of B, whose servants seized and confined A till the following day, when B gave information to the police, it was held that the conduct of B and his servants in confining A could not be supported on the ground that they were exercising the right of private defence of property.⁹ The accused who was watching his field (some of the grain of which had on previous occasions been stolen) saw the deceased cutting his corn. On being pursued the deceased ran his head against a tree and fell. The accused then hit him recklessly with a stick while on the ground and fractured his skull in two places, causing death. It was held that the right of private defence of property had been exceeded and the accused was guilty of culpable homicide.¹⁰ Where in a course of fight a person from one of the parties ran away but was chased by another from the opposite party and was overtaken at a considerable distance and was killed, it was held that the person chasing would be deemed to have exceeded his right of private defence and was guilty under s. 304(1).¹¹ The accused, five in number, went on a moonlight night, armed with clubs and assaulted two men who were cutting their rice crop, one of whom received six distinct fractures of the bones of the skull besides a number of other wounds and was killed on the spot. It was held that they were guilty of murder as they had inflicted more harm than was necessary for the purpose of defending their property.¹² Where the accused three of whom were armed with a sword, a garasa (scythe) and a lobanda (iron-shod stick) respectively, and the rest with clubs, went in a large body to a certain disputed land, where the labourers of the opposite party were reaping some lentil crops, and attacked them, fatally wounding one and severely injuring another; it was held that the accused who ordered the attack, and those who used the sword, garasa and lobanda had exceeded the right of private defence, and so also the others, who continued in the unlawful assembly thereafter and aided and abetted the former.¹³ Where the deceased assaulted the accused and was about to hit him with a clod of earth when the accused struck him two violent blows with a hatchet which he held in his hand and thereby caused his death, it was held that the accused had exceeded his right of private defence because the accused had reasonable apprehension of hurt but not of grievous hurt.¹⁴ Where, in a fight between the accused and the deceased, the latter attacked the former with a kirpan and both of them grappled and the accused succeeded in snatching the kirpan from the deceased, but subsequently inflicted five wounds on the deceased, with the kirpan which he had snatched, it was held that the accused had the right of self-defence but the only right that could be conceded to him was that he could disable K from doing him any harm. He, however, exceeded this right and was guilty under part 1 of this section.¹⁵

English case.—A parker finding a boy stealing wood in his master's ground bound him to his horse's tail and beat him. The horse took fright and ran away, and dragged the boy on the ground till his shoulder was broken, whereof he died. This was ruled to be murder.¹⁶

Arrest.—The English and Indian law differ somewhat on the point of arrest by, or by the direction of, public servants. Under the English law a person offering resistance to a public servant making an arrest is extenuated if the document of warrant or writ is defective in the frame of it, or if the manner of making the arrest is illegal, or if the name of the officer or party is entered without due authority; but the law of India allows no extenuation on any of these accounts as long as the act is bona fide.

Explanations.—Actual knowledge that a person is a public servant or acting by the direction of a public servant, or reasonable ground of knowledge as from his dress, words, weapons, etc., will deprive those against whom he acts of the right of self-defence.¹⁷ The right of private defence is available if the person exercising the right had no reason to believe that the man arresting him was a police officer.¹⁸ In emergent cases in which police officers might act without being clothed in their uniform it is their duty to take some steps to make it clear to the person whom they intend to arrest that they are officers of the law. If they fail to do so, they cannot validly seek the protection of the Court.¹⁹

100. The right of private defence of the body extends, under the restrictions mentioned in the last preceding section, to the voluntary causing of death¹ or of any other harm to the assailant, if the offence which occasions the exercise of the right be of any of the descriptions² hereinafter enumerated, namely :—

When the right of private defence of the body extends to causing death.

First.—Such an assault as may reasonably cause the apprehension that death will otherwise be the consequence³ of such assault;

Secondly.—Such an assault as may reasonably cause the apprehension that grievous hurt⁴ will otherwise be the consequence of such assault ;

Thirdly.—An assault with the intention of committing rape.⁵ ;

Fourthly.—An assault with the intention of gratifying unnatural lust⁶ ;

Fifthly.—An assault with the intention of kidnapping⁷ or abducting⁸ ;

Sixthly.—An assault with the intention of wrongfully confining a person, under circumstances which may reasonably cause him to apprehend that he will be unable to have recourse to the public authorities for his release.

COMMENT.

This section justifies the killing of an assailant when apprehension of atrocious crimes enumerated in the several clauses is caused. It should be read subject to the provision of s. 99.

The section gives the right of private defence against actual assailants. It does not authorize the killing or causing of hurt to persons who may in future when reinforced by others become assailants.

There is no principle of criminal law which prevents people from getting themselves prepared, if necessary, with arms if they anticipate attack upon their subsisting right by an armed set of people.²⁰

1. 'Voluntary causing of death.'—As to the meaning of the word 'voluntary', see s. 39, supra. The law most undoubtedly authorizes a man who is under a reasonable apprehension that his life is in danger or his body in risk of grievous hurt to inflict death upon his assailant either when the assault is attempted or directly threatened, but the apprehension must be reasonable and the violence inflicted must not be greater than is reasonably necessary for the purpose of self-defence. It must be proportionate to and commensurate with the quality and character of the act it is intended to meet and what is done in excess is not protected.²¹

Homicide in self-defence is justifiable, although the party killing is guilty of an assault, or engages in an unlawful conflict; provided (1) that the party killing does not either commence or provoke the attack with intent to kill or do grievous bodily harm; (2) that he kills the assailant because he has reasonable cause for believing it to be necessary so to do, in order to avoid immediate death.²²

2. 'Any of the descriptions.'—A man is not justified in shooting another, who is about to arrest him, where there is nothing to show that he has reason to apprehend that any of the acts mentioned in this section would ensue.²³

3. 'Reasonably cause the apprehension that death will otherwise be the consequence.'—Whether the apprehension was reasonable or not is a question of fact. The weapon used, the manner of using it, the nature of assault and other surrounding circumstances will be taken into account.²⁴ A man acting under an apprehension of death cannot be expected to judge too nicely the force of his own blow. He is not bound to modulate his defence step by step according to the attack before there is reason to believe that the attack is over; he is not obliged to retreat but may pursue his adversary till he finds himself out of danger and if in a conflict between them he happens to kill, such killing is justifiable.²⁵ Where the assault has once assumed a dangerous form, every allowance should be made for one, who, with the instinct of self-preservation strong upon him, pursues his defence a little further than to a perfectly cool bystander would seem absolutely necessary. The question in such cases will be, not whether there was an actually continuing danger but whether there was a reasonable apprehension of such danger.¹ Every attempt or threat to commit an offence would not, however, entitle a man to take up arms. He must pause and reflect whether the threat is intended to be put into execution immediately, because there are many threats which people use as a form of abuse, but which are never intended to be taken seriously and, still others, which the persons saying them have not the capacity to put into immediate execution; for it is only against a danger present and imminent that the right of private defence avails. The law will always make just allowance for the sentiments of a person placed in a situation of peril who has no time to think. His blood is then hot and his sole object is to strike a decisive blow so as to ward off the danger.² In the excitement and confusion of the moment

it is not to be expected that an average man would weigh the means that he intends to adopt on the spur of the moment for self-defence in golden scales, though the counter-attack should not be out of all proportion to the force employed in the original attack.³

4. 'Grievous hurt.'—See s. 320, infra. If a person has genuine apprehension that his adversary is going to attack him and reasonably believes that the attack will result in a grievous hurt he can go to the length of causing the latter's death in the exercise of the right of private defence even though the latter has not inflicted any blow on him. A subsequent blow will also be justified on the same ground if there is every probability that the latter, if not altogether disabled, will try to hit the former. But where the subsequent blow is delivered not on account of this fear but because the latter goes on abusing the former, the subsequent blow is not protected by the right of private defence.⁴

5. 'Rape.'—See s. 375, infra. The right of private defence of the body of a person's wife extends to the voluntary causing of death if the offence which occasioned the exercise of the right was an assault with the intention of committing rape.⁵

6. 'Unnatural lust.'—See s. 377, infra. 7. 'Kidnapping'.—See s. 359, infra.

8. 'Abducting.'—See s. 362, infra. 9. 'Wrongfully confining'.—See s. 340, infra.

CASES.

First clause.—Apprehension of death.—The accused who were two in number were being searched by an armed gang who announced their intention to kill them. The accused took refuge in a dark kitchen of a house. The mob broke into the house and two of them made their way with torches to the kitchen and attacked the accused. One of the attacking party was hacked to death by the accused. It was held that the accused had committed no offence, since they were fighting for life with a murderous mob in front and an enemy who made his way into the room where they had taken refuge, and it was not surprising that they did their best to make sure that their enemy was dead.⁶ A party of armed men escorting ladies met with resistance from certain persons one of whom levelled a gun against a member of the escorting party, but was stabbed to death. It was held that the act of killing was done in self-defence.⁷ Accused, who were Sikhs, abducted a Mahomedan married woman and converted her to Sikhism. Nearly a year after the abduction, the relatives of the woman's husband came and demanded the return of the woman from the accused. The latter refused to return her and the woman herself expressed her unwillingness to go. Thereupon the husband's relative attempted to take her away by force. The accused resisted the attempt and in doing so one of them inflicted a blow on the head of one of the woman's assailants which caused the latter's death. It was held that the right of the accused to defend the woman against her assailants extended under this section to the causing of death and they had, therefore, committed no offence.⁸ The accused having got a decree against the deceased put up his house for sale in execution. As nobody from the place was prepared to bid, the accused went to a neighbouring place to proclaim that a certain house had been put up for sale. Deceased and another followed him, assaulted him, felled him to the ground and attempted to throttle him, whereupon the accused drew his knife and stabbed the deceased in the chest. The deceased died three days after, having developed pneumonia. It was held that the assault by the deceased, including an attempt by him to throttle the accused, occasioned the exercise of the right of private defence, as it was likely to cause the apprehension that death or grievous hurt would otherwise be the consequence, and that, therefore, the act of the accused was covered by the provisions of this section.⁹ Where the accused was waylaid and attacked by two persons, who were armed with hatchets and he snatched the hatchet from one of them and hit one or both of them in order to save his life, it was held that he was not guilty of any offence.¹⁰ During a quarrel the deceased caught hold of the testicles of the accused and pressed them hard as a result of which the accused losing his self-control, struck the deceased two blows with a knife lying nearby. It was held that the squeezing of testicles could result in death and that, therefore, the accused had apprehension of death or grievous hurt.¹¹

Second clause.—‘Apprehension of grievous hurt.’—Plea allowed.—The deceased rushed at the accused, armed with a heavy weapon and showing every intention to assault him. The accused used his spear, when the deceased was in the very act of delivering a blow to him, and in doing so he killed the deceased. The Sessions Judge held that the right of private defence was exceeded, because the accused had an opportunity of running away. It was held that the accused reasonably anticipated grievous hurt to himself and consequently he had a right to use his spear to defend himself against the blow even to the causing of death.¹² Where the deceased, a sturdy and dissolute young man, upon a quarrel with the accused, his uncle and his uncle’s son, after an exchange of abuse, snatched up a heavy jatu (side post of a cart) three feet long and aimed a blow with it at his uncle and possibly another at his uncle’s son, and his uncle’s son seized a second jatu two feet long, and struck the assailant twice on the head with it in consequence of which he died, it was held that there was no excess of the right of private defence and the accused had committed no offence.¹³ Where the assailants who were armed with dangs (clubs) opened an attack on the accused, who were armed only with a lathi, and a blow given by one of the accused fell on the head of one of the assailants and caused a fatal injury, it was held that the accused did not exceed the right of private defence and were not guilty of any offence.¹⁴

The deceased S and three others, who formed his party, attacked with clubs the accused B and his party, three in number, as the result of a quarrel. One of the party of the deceased struck a blow on the accused which felled him to the ground. The accused rose up and inflicted a blow on the head of S, which fractured his skull causing death within a short time. It was held that under the circumstances of the case the accused did not exceed his right of private defence by inflicting the blow on the head of the deceased, as the circumstances were such as reasonably caused the apprehension that grievous hurt would, but for his action, have been the consequence of the attack that was being made upon him.¹⁵ Where after having picked up a quarrel with the accused and after having inflicted an injury on him with a cutting weapon the deceased was on the point of cutting the accused a second time, and he had had his similar weapon raised for the purpose, when the accused struck the deceased on the head with his weapon and the injury resulted in the death of the deceased, it was held that the deceased’s action in getting ready to cut the accused a second time reasonably caused the accused to apprehend that grievous hurt, if not, indeed, death, would befall him if he did not strike the deceased and therefore he did not exceed the right of private defence.¹⁶ Where persons grew crops on a piece of land which another person cut and carried away and stacked in a field of a third party without interruption and retired from the field and then the persons growing the crops came up in numbers armed with clubs and other weapons, not to commit a premeditated riot but merely to take away the crops they were entitled to and not to use any force unless they were opposed or attacked, and, while so acting within their rights in collecting their own crops with a view to take them away, they were attacked by the party of the person who had stacked the crops, who were also similarly armed, first, by clods of earth and, then, with spears, it was held that the persons growing the crops had the right to defend their persons from an attack with clods and spears, an attack which reasonably caused apprehension that death would be the result, and to cause any injury short of death.¹⁷

Where, after picking up a quarrel and trying to hit the deceased, accused ran for his safety from a subsequent attack with sticks made on him by the deceased, and after running some distance, found that he could not very well make his escape and he turned round and hit the deceased a blow and killed him, it was held that the accused acted in self-defence and was not guilty of any offence.¹⁸ Where a man is attacked by another man who uses a weapon such as a lathi, it is impossible to lay down with any sort of accuracy the extent to which the attacked person rightfully acts in his defence. Where in a quarrel and beating brought about by the illegal act of the deceased himself, the accused while resisting his attack hit him in the head, rather harder than perhaps he intended to have done and thus killed him, it was held that he could not be said to be exceeding his right of self-defence.¹⁹ Similarly, the accused, when confronted with persons armed with lathis, killing one of them in the course of a drunken brawl, was held to have the right of private defence.²⁰ Accused insulted the deceased and the deceased struck him with a stick. Accused retaliated by striking the deceased on the head with a lathi, fractured his skull and killed him. It was held that the accused had acted in the exercise of the right of private defence and could not be held to have exceeded that right.²¹ Where the accused persons were in possession of the land in dispute, and while ploughing the same, they were attacked by a number of men and one of their assailants was armed with a sword stick, and three persons on the side of the accused were assaulted and one of their assailants was struck by a spear by one of the accused as a result of which he died, it was held that the accused were justified by the right of private defence.²²

Plea disallowed.—The accused had an intrigue with one S, wife of A. S and A were sleeping one night in a house about eighty paces from the place where the accused slept. In the early morning S left her cot to visit the accused. A missed her, and suspecting where she had gone followed her with a hatchet. He assaulted the accused and wounded him, whereupon the accused stabbed him with a knife and killed him. It was held that as the accused had not established that voluntarily causing the death of his assailant was necessary for the purpose of defence he could not plead the right of defence.²³ Where a person armed with a dagger went to the house of another to commit an offence, knowing that he might be discovered, and on being so discovered and pursued, he stabbed and killed one of his pursuers, who were unarmed, it was held that he could not claim the right of self-defence.²⁴ Where the accused were in possession of disputed land and the affray originated from the prosecution party trespassing upon it and obstructing the accused's party from ploughing it, it was held that the accused's party was entitled to defend their land and their bodies against any violence used by the prosecution party, but it extended to the right of causing death only when exercised against such an assault as might reasonably cause the apprehension that death or grievous hurt would otherwise be the result.²⁵ Where the accused was the aggressor and the deceased attacked him with a knife and the accused stabbed him in self-defence, it was held that the accused was not entitled to claim entire acquittal pleading the right of self-defence but was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹ A certain amount of abuse was bandied about by members of a tea party, in the course of which the deceased picked up a dhama from the floor and slashed with it at the accused who thereupon went outside the hut. He returned, however, armed with a stick and struck the deceased with it on the head and the deceased died of the injury. It was held that as the accused was able to leave the hut quite unscathed, it could not be held that, at the time when he returned to the hut and struck the deceased, the right of private defence of the body by the accused was occasioned by any offence committed by the deceased.²

Third clause.—Rape.—Where the husband and other relations of a girl assaulted a man while he was in the very act of violating her, it was held that they were justified under this clause.³

Fifth clause.—Abducting.—The accused owed some money to a moneylender. The latter sent two persons armed with lathis and kirpans to collect the dues. They met the accused and insisted on his accompanying them to their master and on his refusal to do so, dragged him along. On the way the accused stabbed one of the peons in the abdomen and the peon died on the next day. It was held that the act of the peons constituted abduction, but in stabbing the peon the accused exceeded the right of private defence and was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Where the defence is that the party was about to commit such a crime as would justify his death, this must be proved, not indeed so as to establish the fact conclusively, but so as to prove that the accused had such grounds for supposing violence was intended as would warrant a rational man in so acting, and he must prove that the offence about to be committed could not have been prevented by milder means.⁵

101. If the offence be not of any of the descriptions enumerated in the last preceding section, the right of private defence of the body does not extend to the voluntary causing of death to the assailant, but does extend, under the restrictions mentioned in section 99, to the voluntary causing to the assailant of any harm other than death.

When such right extends to causing any harm other than death.

COMMENT.

When dealing with questions relating to the right of private defence of the body, ss. 100 and 101 must be read together.⁶

Under this section any harm short of death can be inflicted in exercising the right of private defence in any case which does not fall within the provisions of the preceding section which deals with offences in which the harm is likely to be very serious, and hence justifies the killing of the assailant.

CASES

A dispute arose between two parties, Mollahs and Shikdars. Shikdars attacked and killed one of the Mollahs who were exercising the right of retaking their own property. Three of the Shikdars were also wounded. The Shikdars were convicted of culpable homicide not amounting to murder and rioting. The Mollahs were held entitled to the protection conferred by this section.⁷ A public servant while acting in the execution of his duties had his conveyance stopped by a number of camel-drivers whose camels were trespassing on the banks of a canal belonging to Government. A prisoner who had been legally arrested was forcibly rescued from his possession. He thereupon apprehending personal violence fired his gun without taking a careful aim at his assailants and wounded one of them. It was held that he was protected under this section.⁸

Commencement and continuance of the right of private defence of the body.

102. The right of private defence of the body commences as soon as a reasonable apprehension¹ of danger to the body arises from an attempt or threat to commit the offence though the offence may not have been committed; and it continues as long as such apprehension of danger to the body continues.

COMMENT.

This section indicates when the right of private defence of the body commences and till what time it continues. It commences and continues as long as danger to body lasts.

1. 'Reasonable apprehension.'—The right commences only on a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body caused by an attempt or threat to commit an offence.⁹ There must be an attempt or threat, and consequent thereon an apprehension of danger; but it is not a mere idle threat, or every apprehension of a rash or timid mind, that will justify the exercise of the right. Reasonable ground for the apprehension is requisite. Suppose the threat to proceed from a woman or a child and to be addressed to a strong man; in such a case there would hardly be a reasonable apprehension. Present and imminent danger seems to be meant. But if a man is preparing himself, as by seizing a dangerous weapon in such a way that he manifestly intends immediate violence, this seems sufficient justification of the exercise of the right; for his conduct amounts to a threat and the other has reason to consider the danger to be imminent.¹⁰

When danger is not present but may be avoided, can a man who voluntarily seeks it be said to have a reasonable apprehension of such danger? As if A knowing that B is waiting to attack and rob him, proceeds on his road with the deliberate purpose of resisting the attack with all necessary force, and does so, and thereby causes B's death. A appears to be entitled to the benefit of the exception, for he had a reasonable apprehension of danger when B attacked him, notwithstanding the attack was not unforeseen.¹¹ The view that a person should not exercise his right of self-defence, if by running away he can avoid injury from his assailant, places a greater restriction on the right of private defence of the body than the law requires. The extent to which the exercise of the right will be justified will depend not on the actual danger but on whether there was reasonable apprehension of such danger.¹² The law does not require that a person placed in such circumstances should weigh the arguments for and against, 'in golden scales.' It would be unnatural to expect him to do so, and the law in fact does not require any such thing from such person. The question to be asked is not, what a perfectly cool by-stander would think absolutely necessary, but whether there was reasonable apprehension of danger to life or property on the part of the accused having regard to all the circumstances; and allowance should be made for one who with the instinct of self-preservation strong upon him pursues his defence a little further than might appear to be absolutely necessary to a cool by-stander.¹³ A man may justify a battery if he proves merely an assault on the part of the prosecutor, and he need not stay until the prosecutor has actually struck him but the battery must be such only as was necessary for his defence.¹⁴

The law does not require a person labouring under a reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt to his companion to postpone his right of defending the body of his companion till it is seen that the latter, unaided, fails to eradicate the source of danger.¹⁵

A bare fear of any offence, however well grounded, as that another lies in wait to take away the party's life, unaccompanied with any overt act, indicative of such an intention, will not warrant him in killing that other by way of prevention. There must be an actual danger at the time.¹⁶ But, if the party killing had reasonable grounds for believing that the person slain had a felonious design against him, and under that supposition kill him, although it should afterwards appear that there was no such design, the act would amount to culpable homicide or even accident, according to the degree of the caution used and the probable grounds for such belief.¹⁷

CASES.

Reasonable apprehension.—Where the accused apprehending opposition went armed to appraise crops and on the arrival of the opposite party similarly armed did not wait till that party had attacked but proceeded to meet them and a fight took place, it was held that the accused had acted within the right of private defence which commenced as soon as the opposite party appeared with arms and began to move towards them which was a distinct threat to attack them.¹⁸ Deceased, a strong man of a dangerous character and brutal nature and reputed to have killed a man previously, had some quarrel with the accused but was taken back to his house. Later he returned armed with a stick, entered the shop of the accused who was comparatively a weakling, threw him on the ground, pressed his neck and bit on his hand and chest. When the accused was extricated from the assailant's grip he took up a light hatchet and struck three blows on the head of the deceased as a result of which he died after three days. It was held that the whole conduct of the deceased was aggressive and that even though no grievous hurt was actually caused to the accused, the circumstances were sufficient to raise a strong apprehension in his mind that he was under a reasonable apprehension of receiving such injury at the hand of his assailant unless he succeeded in disabling him and that he did not exceed the right of private defence.¹⁹

No reasonable apprehension.—A and B met at a drinking shop and drank together. On their departure A and B quarrelled about B having, as A declared, caused the death of the latter's four children by incantation. B admitted it, and said he would cause A to be taken by a tiger at once, at which A killed him with a club. It was held that A had no reasonable apprehension of danger.²⁰ Where the accused fired a gun at a person at a distance of twenty-five yards, without a reasonable apprehension of danger, and without any necessity for so doing, it was held that his act was not justifiable.²¹

103. The right of private defence of property extends, under the restrictions mentioned in section 99, to the voluntary causing of death or of any other harm to the wrong-doer, if the offence, the committing of which, or the attempting to commit which, occasions the exercise of the right, be an offence of any of the descriptions hereinafter enumerated; namely:—

First.—Robbery¹;

Secondly.—House-breaking² by night;

Thirdly.—Mischief³ by fire committed on any building, tent or vessel, which building, tent or vessel is used as a human dwelling, or as a place for the custody of property;

Fourthly.—Theft,⁴ mischief or house-trespass,⁵ under such circumstances as may reasonably cause apprehension that death or grievous hurt will be the consequence, if such right of private defence is not exercised.

COMMENT.

This section indicates when a person can be killed in defence of one's own property; s. 100 indicates when a person can be killed in defence of one's body. But both the sections are subject to the provisions of s. 99.

A person employed to guard the property of his employer is protected by ss. 97, 99, this section and s. 105, if he causes death in safeguarding his employers' property, when there is reason to apprehend that the person whose death has been caused was about to commit one of the offences mentioned in this section, or to attempt to commit one of those offences. A person whose duty it is to guard a public building is in the same position, that is to say, it is his duty to protect the property of his employer and he may take such steps for this purpose as the law permits. The fact that the property to be guarded is public property does not extend the protection given to a guard.²²

A distinction is observed between such offences as are attended with force, or any extraordinary degree of atrocity, which in their nature betoken such urgent necessity as will not allow of any delay, and others of a different sort, if no resistance be made by the offender: and, therefore, a party would not be justified in killing another who was attempting to pick his pocket.²³ A police constable on guard duty at a magazine or other public building is not entitled to fire at a person merely because the latter does not answer his challenge.²⁴

Scope.—The right extends not only when the offences enumerated in the section are committed, but also when an attempt to commit any such offences is made.²⁵

1. 'Robbery.'—See s. 390, infra. Robbery by violence may be resisted by violence sufficient to overcome the force employed by the attacker, and if, in the course of such resistance, death is caused, it may be justified if the right of self-defence was exercised reasonably and properly, but the measure of self-defence must always be proportionate to the quantum of force used by the attacker and which it is necessary to repel.¹

2. 'House-breaking.'—See s. 445, infra. The right of private defence of property to the extent of causing death arises not only when the house is broken into but when an attempt is made to break into the house. It is not the intention of the law that the right to defend property is available only when the thief has already effected entry, for property may be protected by attacking the thief inside the house as much as by preventing his entry into it. Where the accused was led honestly to believe that a burglar was attempting to enter his house and thus caused the death of that person, who was his own nephew, it was held that he did not exceed the right of private defence of property and had not committed any offence.²

The inmates of a house have the right, in the exercise of the right of private defence of property, of causing even the death of an offender who commits burglary or house-breaking in their house, but this right of killing an offender who commits burglary is subject to the provisions of this section which lays down very clearly that the right of private defence in no case extends to the inflicting of more harm than it is necessary to inflict for the purpose of defence. Where the owners of a house have the thief at their mercy as he is coming out of a hole in the wall, it is not necessary for them to beat him to death with lathi blows and if they cause his death by fracture on his skull, they exceed the right of private defence of property and Exception (2) to s. 300 applies to their case.³

3. 'Mischief.'—See s. 425, infra. 4. 'Theft'—See s. 378, infra.

5. 'House-trespass.'—See s. 442, infra.

to the police, inflicted a wound on one of them with a bamboo, from the effects of which the man died. It was held that the force used, or the injuries inflicted, by the accused were not such as to exceed the right of private defence of property.⁴

House-breaking.—The accused found two men close to an aperture made in his house for committing burglary. One of them made off but the other advanced to attack the accused, when the latter gave him a blow in the dark with a club, which killed him. It was held that the accused was justified in his act.⁵

The accused, on being awakened in the middle of the night, discovered the deceased in his courtyard, the latter having effected his entrance by scaling the wall, which surrounded it on all four sides. The courtyard, of which the small gate was locked, adjoined the room in which the accused had been sleeping, and was for practical purposes one of the rooms of the house, and an integral part of the building. In the scuffle the accused killed the deceased by striking him on the head with a club. It was held that the courtyard was a building though unroofed, and that the accused, not knowing in the dark, whether the burglar was armed or not, did not exceed his right of self-defence under clause 4 of this section, by striking him three times and causing his death.⁶

Theft.—A thief entered the sugar plantation of the accused and began to cut sugar canes with a dah (edged instrument). The accused on hearing the sound aimed with a cross-bow in the direction of the sound and shot. The bolt hit the thief in the side and caused his death. It was held that as the thief had the dah with him the accused was justified in defending his property by shooting an arrow at the thief, and with a deadly weapon not actually intending to kill him, but knowing it to be likely that he would kill him, and that the accused had acted in good faith for the protection of his person and property.⁷

104. If the offence, the committing of which, or the attempting to commit which, occasions the exercise of the right of private defence, be theft, mischief, or criminal trespass, not of any of the descriptions enumerated in the last preceding section, that right does not extend to the voluntary causing of death, but does extend, subject to the restrictions mentioned in section 99, to the voluntary causing to the wrong-doer of any harm other than death.

When such right extends to causing any harm other than death.

COMMENT.

Section 101 and this section restrict the right of private defence in certain cases to voluntarily causing hurt or grievous hurt. This section is connected with s. 103 just as s. 101 is with s. 100. Thus, where the offence which occasions the right of private defence of property is theft,⁸ mischief,⁹ or criminal trespass,¹⁰ the right of defence under this section only extends to the voluntarily causing to the wrong-doers some harm other than death.

This section has no application by way of defence to a charge under s. 504 (insult to provoke breach of the peace). The accused was taking earth from a tank whereupon the complainant having objected, the accused filthily abused him. The accused was thereupon tried for an offence under s. 504 and his defence was that the tank was in his possession and belonged to him. The Magistrate held that, as the complainant had failed to prove his possession of the disputed tank, the accused was justified under this section in voluntarily using abusive language. He therefore acquitted the accused.

On appeal, a retrial was ordered on the ground that this section could have no application by way of defence to a charge under s. 504.¹¹

CASES.

In an affray respecting land, one of the aggressive party was killed. The accused, who were exercising the right of private defence of property, were not found guilty of culpable homicide, but were convicted of rioting. It was held that the accused, not being legally guilty of culpable homicide, were not legally guilty of any other offence coupled with rioting, and, not being rioters, or members of an unlawful assembly, could claim the benefit of this section.¹² Where a person assisted by a friend retaliated severely on another, who trespassed into his house with the object of having intercourse with his wife, they were held to have committed no offence.¹³ Where A trespassed on the lands of B, whose servants seized and confined A till the following day, when B gave information to the police, it was held that the conduct of B and his servants in confining A could not be supported on the ground that they were exercising the right of private defence of property.¹⁴ Where a police-officer entered into the house of a person of suspicious character at midnight to see whether he was in the house and he was pushed out of the house by that person, it was held that the act of the police-officer in entering into the house was house-trespass and that that person was justified in pushing him out.¹⁵

105. The right of private defence of property commences when a reasonable apprehension of danger to the property commences.¹

The right of private defence of property against theft continues till the offender has effected his retreat with the property or either the assistance of the public authorities is obtained, or the property has been recovered.²

The right of private defence of property against robbery continues as long as the offender causes or attempts to cause to any person death or hurt or wrongful restraint or as long as the fear of instant death or of instant hurt or of instant personal restraint continues.

The right of private defence of property against criminal trespass or mischief continues as long as the offender continues in the commission of criminal trespass or mischief.³

The right of private defence of property against house-breaking by night continues as long as the house-trespass which has been begun by such house-breaking continues.⁴

COMMENT.

This section defines the commencement and continuance of the right of private defence of property just as s. 99 does in the case of defence of body. In both the cases the right commences with the reasonable apprehension of danger.

1. First clause.—The right of private defence of property commences when a reasonable apprehension of danger to the property commences. Before such apprehension commences the owner of the property is not called upon to apply for protection to the public authorities. See Comment on cl. (8) under s. 99, supra.

It is not the law that the rightful owner in peaceful possession of property must run away, if there is an actual invasion of his right and an attempt on his person. The person in possession of property is entitled to defend himself and his property by force and to collect such members and such arms as are necessary for the purpose, if he sees an actual invasion of his rights, which invasion amounts to an offence under the Penal Code and when there is no time to get police help. It is lawful for a person, who has seen an invasion of his rights, to go to the spot and object. It is also lawful for such person, if the opposite party is armed, to take suitable weapons for his defence.¹⁶

2. Second clause.—“Till the offender has effected his retreat with the property.”—“We are not sure of the meaning intended by the expression ‘till the offender has effected his retreat with the property.’ We know not certainly when he is to be considered as having effected his retreat; probably it is when he has once got clear off, having escaped immediate pursuit, or pursuit not having been made;.... We presume that the protection of parties pursuing robbers, &c., for the recovery of property which they have succeeded in carrying off, or for bringing them to justice, was thought not to be within the scope of the provisions touching the right of private defence.”¹⁷ It was suggested “that the privilege of this clause should operate till the offender is taken and delivered to an officer of Justice.”¹⁸

Where certain cattle were illegally attached by an official and his party but were recovered by the accused as they were being taken away, and there was a fight between the attaching party and the accused, it was held that the accused had a right of private defence of their property as it could not be said that the official and his party had effected their retreat with the property.¹⁹

This provision only applies to stolen property and not to property acquired dishonestly within the meaning of ss. 403 and 411.²⁰

“Or either the assistance of the public authorities is obtained.”—These words did not exist in the draft Code. They were added subsequently.

“Or the property has been recovered.”—A recapture of the plundered property, while it is in course of being carried away, is authorized, for the taking and re-taking is one transaction. But when the offence has been committed and the property removed, a recapture after an interval of time by the owner or by other person on his behalf, however justifiable, cannot be deemed an exercise of the right of defence of property. The recovery which the section contemplates seems to be a recovery either immediate or made before the offender has reached his final retreat; as where stolen cattle are tracked until ultimately overtaken in their retreat and recaptured.²¹ Mayne²² is of opinion that “resistance, within the justifiable limits, may be continued so long as the wrongful act is going on. But when the robber, for instance, has made his escape, the principle of self-defence would not extend to killing him if met with on a subsequent day. If, however, the property were found in his possession, the right of defence would revive for the purpose of its recovery. It by no means follows, however, that the right would revive to the same extent as it formerly existed at the commission of the original offence. Only such violence is lawful as would be justifiable against a person who has stolen property without intimidation; and if he resists by means which create no apprehension of death or grievous hurt, he cannot be killed, by virtue of anything contained in these sections. This is the ground of the distinction drawn in Explanation 2 and 3 between theft and robbery. In the former case, the right of defence appears to last longer than it does in the latter. What is meant is, that the right of defence against robbery, as such, only lasts as long as the robbery. While the fear of death, hurt, or wrongful restraint, which causes theft to grow into robbery (s. 390) continues, the offender may be killed. But when he takes to his heels with the booty the robbery is over, and the right of defence is reduced to what would have been admissible against a pickpocket.” Mayne’s view has received support from a ruling of the Judicial Commissioner of the Central Provinces, which lays down that while in all other cases the right only exists for the purposes of prevention of the offences named, in the particular case of theft the right continues for the recovery of the property even after the theft has been accomplished. The extent of such right is that mentioned in s. 104.²³

The Lahore High Court has differed from this view in a case in which the accused followed up tracks purporting to be those of their stolen cattle, and, prior to the arrival of the police (for whose assistance one of their party had ridden away) proceeded to the complainants' village and fired at them. It was held that the accused's right of private defence of their property had been put an end to by the successful retreat of the thieves and that their alleged re-discovery of the cattle in the complainants' possession could not revive that right.²⁴ The Nagpur High Court has doubted the earlier decision and held that the right of private defence of property against theft comes to an end if the offender has effected his retreat with the property or the assistance of the public authorities has been obtained or the property has been recovered.²⁵

Certain persons without any bona fide right removed paddy sheaves belonging to the accused who attacked the cartmen in whose carts the sheaves were being carried. The cartmen jumped out and ran off, the accused chasing them and the persons at whose instance the sheaves were carted. Injuries were inflicted and death of one of them was caused by the accused. It was held that the accused had undoubtedly a right of private defence to their property and were entitled to prevent the paddy sheaves being taken away, but their right of private defence ceased from the moment the cartmen jumped down to make their escape leaving the paddy sheaves in the possession of the accused; that they had no right to chase the cartmen and in so doing their actions were not covered by any right of private defence at all. It was also held that the accused were guilty of offences under cl. (1) of s. 304 read with s. 34 in connection with the causing of the death of the deceased, even though the author of the injuries be not known.¹

3. Fourth clause.—Against criminal trespass the person in possession of the property has the right of private defence of property so long as the trespass continues and this right extends to causing to the trespassers any harm other than death subject to the restrictions mentioned in s. 99, namely, that no more harm should be inflicted than is necessary for the purposes of defence and that there is no time to have recourse to the protection of the authorities. If, in the exercise of this right, such resistance is offered by the trespassers that a reasonable apprehension is caused to the owners that death or grievous hurt would be the result, the right of private defence of person then arises and extends to the causing of death.²

Where land in the possession of A was encroached on by the servants of B, who committed mischief on the land, and the servants of A assembled after the alleged mischief had been completed, there being no suggestion that the mischief was likely to be renewed, it was held that the servants of A could not claim the right of private defence of property which had ceased under this clause.³

The complainant's party, consisting of twelve or thirteen persons, went with pickaxes to a bund (embankment) erected on the land of the master of the accused in order to cut it, as it obstructed the flow of water from their lands and destroyed their crops. The accused hearing of this at once assembled to the number of 50 or 60, armed themselves with clubs and proceeded to the bund. At this time the complainant's party had either finished the cutting or ceased to do so, when they saw the accused approaching. The latter attacked the complainant's party and drove them to their village. One or more of the assailants also beat a man, who was present there, but was not connected with the cutting of the bund, both in the first attack and when they returned from the chase, and fractured his skull, in consequence of which he died shortly after. It was held that the accused were members of an unlawful assembly from the beginning, as they went armed with clubs and in large numbers to enforce their right at all hazards, that, if not so at the beginning, they became an unlawful assembly, and had no right of private defence, when the opposite party had ceased cutting the bund, and that, even if they had, they exceeded their right by attacking their opponents and chasing them and by beating the deceased.⁴ Certain cattle belonging to the accused trespassed on the complainant's field and grazed there. An attempt was made by the complainant to seize them with a view to take them to the cattle pound. The cattle ran away towards the field of the accused and were chased by the complainant and his friends. The chasers were joined by the deceased who lagged behind. The accused inflicted fatal injuries on him. It was held that the accused had no right of private defence as the deceased had not seized any cattle and was a mere straggler.⁵

4. Fifth clause.—The right of private defence against house-breaking continues only so long as the house-trespass continues, hence where a person followed a thief and killed him in the open, after the house-trespass had ceased, it was held that he could not plead the right of private defence.⁶

106. If, in the exercise of the right of private defence against an assault which reasonably causes the apprehension of death, the defender be so situated that he cannot effectually exercise that right without risk of harm to an innocent person, his right of private defence extends to the running of that risk.

Right of private defence against deadly assault when there is risk of harm to innocent person.

ILLUSTRATION.

A is attacked by a mob who attempt to murder him. He cannot effectually exercise his right of private defence without firing on the mob, and he cannot fire without risk of harming young children who are mingled with the mob. A commits no offence if by so firing he harms any of the children.

COMMENT.

This section should be read in the light of s. 100. It provides for the risk which a person may have to run to defend himself against an assault reasonably causing the apprehension of his death.

CHAPTER V.

OF ABETMENT.

THIS Chapter applies to offences punishable under ss. 121A, 124A, 225A, 225B, 294A and 304A.¹

Abetment of a thing. 107. A person abets the doing of a thing, who—

First.—Instigates any person to do that thing; or,

Secondly.—Engages with one or more other person or persons in any conspiracy for the doing of that thing, if an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy, and in order to the doing of that thing; or Thirdly.—Intentionally aids, by any act or illegal omission, the doing of that thing.

Explanation 1.—A person who, by wilful misrepresentation, or by wilful concealment of a material fact which he is bound to disclose, voluntarily causes or procures, or attempts to cause or procure, a thing to be done, is said to instigate the doing of that thing.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, a public officer, is authorized by a warrant from a Court of Justice to apprehend Z. B, knowing that fact and also that C is not Z, wilfully represents to A that C is Z, and thereby intentionally causes A to apprehend C. Here B abets by instigation the apprehension of C.

Explanation 2.—Whoever, either prior to or at the time of the commission of an act, does anything in order to facilitate the commission of that act, and thereby facilitates the commission thereof, is said to aid the doing of that act.

COMMENT.

When an offence is committed and several persons take part in the commission of it, each person may contribute in a manner and degree different from the others to the doing of the criminal act.

The act may be done by the hands of one person while another is present, or is close at hand ready to afford help; or the actual doer may be a guilty agent acting under the orders of an absent person: and besides these participators, there may be other persons who contribute less directly to the commission of the offence by advice, persuasion, incitement or aid. It is proper to mark the nature and degree of participation which is essential to criminal liability, but it will be seen that the several gradations of action above referred to are not always treated as denoting necessarily different measures of guilt with a view to distinction in respect of punishment.

We have seen that if several persons, combining both in intent and act, commit an offence jointly, each is guilty, as if he had done the whole alone; and that so it is, if each has his several part to do, all contributing to one result. When all combine, each does the act so far as his own part extends, and as to the residue may be regarded as procuring it to be done by means of guilty agents: all the parties, so concerned, stand in the mutual relation of principals and agents. The present Chapter treats of co-agency of a less direct and immediate kind: the agent being urged forward by a person who will not himself act, but who procures or instigates another to put in execution his criminal intention.² Under this Chapter persons rendering any kind of assistance to the criminal are punishable. Jeremy Bentham³ says: "The more these preparatory acts are distinguished, for the purpose of prohibiting them, the greater the chance of preventing the execution of the principal crime itself. If the criminal be not stopped at the first step of his career, he may at the second, or the third. It is thus that a prudent legislator, like a skilful general, reconnoitres all the external posts of the enemy, with the intention of stopping his enterprises. He places, in all the defiles, in all the windings of his route, a chain of works, diversified according to circumstances, but connected among themselves, in such manner that the enemy finds in each, new dangers and new obstacles."

Abetment under the Penal Code involves active complicity on the part of the abettor at a point of time prior to the actual commission of the offence, and it is of the essence of the crime of abetment that the abettor should substantially assist the principal culprit towards the commission of the offence. Nowhere concurrence in the criminal acts of another without such participation therein as helps to effect the criminal act or purpose is punishable under the Code.

Abetment is a separate and distinct offence provided the thing abetted is an offence.⁴ Abetment does not in itself involve the actual commission of the crime abetted. "It is a crime apart."⁵ If no one commits an offence nobody else can be said to abet that offence.⁶

As a general rule a charge of abetment fails if the substantive offence is not established against the principal. But there may be an exception where the substantive offence was undoubtedly committed, and there is evidence, such as a retracted confession by the abettor, on which the jury might have found, as against him, that the offence was committed by the principal, though, as against the latter, the confession would be insufficient for a conviction of murder.⁷

Scope.—The definition of 'abetment' given here applies to all Acts passed by the Government of India.⁸

Ingredients.—Abetment is constituted (1) by instigating a person to commit an offence; or (2) by engaging in a conspiracy to commit it; or (3) by intentionally aiding a person to commit it.⁹

(1) Abetment by instigation.—First clause.—A person is said to 'instigate' another to an act, when he actively suggests or stimulates him to the act by any means or language, direct or indirect, whether it takes the form of express solicitation, or of hints, insinuation or encouragement.¹⁰ The word 'instigate' means to goad or urge forward or to provoke, incite, urge or encourage to do an act. A mere intention or preparation to instigate is neither instigation nor abetment.¹¹ Advice can become 'instigation' if it is meant actively to suggest or stimulate the commission of an offence. Advice per se cannot necessarily be instigation.¹² A mere acquiescence, or permission, does not amount to an instigation. Nor can deliberate absence from the scene of offence amount to instigation.¹³ Instigation implies knowledge of the criminality of an act. Words which amount merely to a permission may perhaps amount to an instigation, but this will depend on the position of the speaker and the occasion on which they are spoken.* Where the accused expressed approval of the conduct of certain persons who were maltreating a tenant for committing extortion and as a result of his suggestion that "the tenants ought to be beaten," blows were inflicted, it was held that the accused's remarks stimulated the commission of an offence and, therefore, his conviction under s. 330 and this section was proper.¹⁴

The word 'instigation', as used in this section, may be an instigation of an unknown person.¹⁵

Explanation 1 to this section says that a person who (1) by wilful misrepresentation, or (2) by wilful concealment of a material fact which he is bound to disclose, voluntarily causes or procures, or attempts to cause or procure, a thing to be done, is said to instigate the doing of that thing. The illustration is an example of instigation by 'wilful misrepresentation.' Instigation by 'wilful concealment' is where some duty exists which obliges a person to disclose a fact. A mere omission to bring certain facts within the knowledge of the accused to the notice of the higher authorities does not itself constitute abetment, unless the omission is one which can be said to be an illegal omission, i.e., involves a breach of a duty imposed by law, and not merely a breach of a departmental rule of conduct or discipline. It cannot be said that the mere omission to bring to the notice of the higher authorities offences committed by other persons amounts to abetment of those offences. It may form the foundation for departmental action against him in a departmental way, but it cannot in law amount to abetment of the offence committed by a fellow clerk.¹⁶ Mere failure to prevent the commission of an offence is not by itself an abetment, when there is nothing to show that the accused instigated the commission of the offence or helped in any way to do it.¹⁷

The offence is complete as soon as the abettor has incited another to commit a crime, whether the latter consents or not, or whether, having consented he commits the crime or not. This form of abetment depends upon the intention of the person who abets, and not upon the act, which is actually done by the person whom he abets.¹⁸

Instigation through a third party.—It is immaterial whether the instigation be personal, or through the intervention of a third person.¹⁹ A person may constitute himself an abettor by the intervention of a third person without any direct communication between himself and the person employed to do the thing, and in the case of abetment by conspiracy, it is not necessary that the abettor should concert the offence with the person who commits it. It is sufficient if he engages in the conspiracy in pursuance of which the offence is committed.²⁰

Cases.—Master's liability.—Where, of several persons constituting an unlawful assembly, some only were armed with sticks, and A, one of them, was not so armed, but picked up a stick, and used it, B (the master of A), who gave a general order to beat, was held guilty of abetting the assault by A.²¹ The carrying off of certain buffaloes, belonging to the complainant, by order of the accused, and the retention of them in the custody of the latter's servant, were held to amount to an abetment of theft.²²

Suppression of evidence.—Where the accused asked a witness to suppress certain facts in giving his evidence, it was held that this was an abetment of giving false evidence.²³

Deliberate absence is no instigation.—Where persons of influence being aware of the objects of the members of an unlawful assembly deliberately absented themselves from the locality where such assembly was formed, it was held that that was not such sympathy as amounted to instigation.²⁴

Instigation to commit offence by letter or telephone.—Where one person instigates another to the commission of an offence by means of a letter sent through the post, the offence of abetment by instigation is completed as soon as the contents of such letter become known to the addressee.²⁵ If the letter never reaches him the act is only an attempt to abet.¹ The accused telephoned to W asking if he could have two boys for immoral purposes. No particular boys were named or indicated. The accused was charged with inciting W "to procure the commission by certain male unknown persons of acts of gross indecency with him", the accused. It was held that as the accused was inciting W to commit what, if he had done the acts, would have been a criminal offence, it was immaterial that the male persons whom he was to procure were not at the time ascertained or that the accused was inciting W to incite another to commit an offence, and that the accused was rightly convicted.²

Consent to hold stakes.—Two men, having quarrelled, agreed to fight with their fists, and to bind themselves to fight, each put down £1, so that £2 might be paid to the winner. The accused consented to hold the £2, and to pay it over to the winner. Otherwise, he had nothing to do with the fight and he was not present at it. There was no reason to suppose that the life of either man would be endangered. The men fought, and one of them received injuries of which he afterwards died. The accused having been informed who was the winner, but not knowing of the other man's danger, paid over the £2 to the winner. It was held that the mere consent to hold the stakes could not be said to amount to a participation in the fight.³

(2) Abetment by conspiracy.—Second clause.—"Conspiracy" consists in a combination and agreement by persons to do some illegal act or to effect a legal purpose by illegal means. "So long as such a design rests in intention only, it is not indictable. When two agree to carry it into effect, the very plot is an act in itself, and the act of each of the parties, promise against promise, actus contra actum, capable of being enforced, if lawful, punishable if for a criminal object or for the use of criminal means. And so far as proof goes, conspiracy, as Grose, J., said in The King v. Briscoe,⁴ is generally 'matter of inference, deduced from certain criminal acts of the parties accused, done in pursuance of an apparent criminal purpose in common between them.' The number and the compact give weight and cause danger."⁵

Conspiracy is now made a substantive offence in India. In order to constitute the offence of abetment by conspiracy, there must be a combining together of two or more persons in the conspiracy, and an act, or illegal omission must take place in pursuance of that conspiracy and in order to the doing of that thing. It is not necessary that the abettor should concert the offence with the person who commits it. It is sufficient if he engages in the conspiracy in pursuance of which the offence is committed.⁶ Where parties concert together, and have a common object, the act of one of the parties done in furtherance of the common object and in pursuance of the concerted plan is the act of the whole.⁷ Where persons combine to attack a common enemy, each is abetting the conduct of the other.⁸

A mere conspiracy would not amount to abetment, and it would appear that if conspirators were detected before they had done more than discussed plans, with a general intention to commit an offence, they would not be liable as abettors.

Before the introduction of Chapter VA, conspiracy, except in cases provided⁹ for by ss. 121A, 311, 400, 401 and 402 of the Code, was a mere species of abetment where an act or an illegal omission took place in pursuance of that conspiracy, and amounted to a distinct offence for each distinct offence abetted by conspiracy.¹⁰

A conviction for conspiracy cannot stand when the charge against the other alleged conspirators has failed.¹¹ When a conspiracy between several persons is alleged, it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove, before it can be held established, that each conspirator knew and had personal communication with all the rest, because some of them might be intermediaries.¹²

Cases.—Suicide.—Sati.—Evidence that a woman prepared herself to commit suicide in the presence of the accused, that they followed her to the pyre, and stood by her, her step-sons crying "Ram, Ram," and one of the accused admitted that he told the woman to say "Ram, Ram," and she would become suttee, was held to prove active connivance and unequivocal countenance of the suicide by the accused, and to justify the inference that they had engaged with her in a conspiracy for the commission of the suttee.¹³ It is no defence that the abettors were expecting a miracle and did not anticipate that the pyre would be ignited by human agency.¹⁴

Forgery.—To prepare, in conjunction with others, a copy of an intended false document, and to buy a stamped paper for the purpose of writing such false document, and to ask for information as to a fact to be inserted in such false document, are facts which would support a conviction for abetment of forgery as being acts done to facilitate the commission of the offence.¹⁵

Abortion.—A woman who, believing herself to be with child, but not being with child, conspires with other persons to administer drugs to herself, or to use instruments on herself, with intent to procure abortion, is liable to be convicted of conspiracy to procure abortion.¹⁶

Giving false information.—When, as the result of a conspiracy to make a false report, one person makes a false report in pursuance of the conspiracy and another accompanies him and says nothing, the person who tells the story is guilty under the provisions of s. 182 and the other of abetment.¹⁷

(3) Abetment by aid.—Third clause.—(a) By an act.—A person abets by aiding, when by any act done either prior to, or at the time of, the commission of an act, he intends to facilitate, and does in fact facilitate, the commission thereof (vide expln. 2). For instance, the supplying of necessary food to a person known to be engaged in crime is not per se criminal; but if food were supplied in order that the criminal might go on a journey to the intended scene of the crime or conceal himself while waiting for an opportunity to commit the crime, the supplying of food would be in order to facilitate the commission of the crime and might facilitate it.¹⁸ “The intention should be to aid the commission of a crime. A mere giving of an aid will not make the act an abetment of an offence, if the person who gave the aid did not know that an offence was being committed or contemplated. The intention should be to aid an offence or to facilitate the commission of an offence. But if the person who lends his support does not know or has no reason to believe that the act which he was aiding or supporting was in itself a criminal act, it cannot be said that he intentionally aids or facilitates the doing of the offence. I will give an example. A, B and C are friends. A and B have fallen out, so much so that A is determined to shoot B. A goes to the house of C, and on some pretext or other induces C to call B to his house. C has not the least idea that A would shoot B on his arrival. B arrives and is murdered by A. A committed murder. Can it be said that C is guilty of abetment, because he ‘intentionally aided’ A? C did give his aid in calling B to his place. But he never knew why A wanted him to send for B. Whatever C did, he did intentionally, for his intention it certainly was that B should come. But it was not C’s intention that a crime should be committed. C cannot be held guilty of abetment of murder.”¹⁹

A person who knowingly aids in the disposal of stolen property is an accomplice within the meaning of this clause.²⁰

Presence does not amount to aiding.—Mere presence at the commission of a crime cannot amount to intentional aid, unless it was intended to have that effect. To be present and aware that an offence is about to be committed does not constitute abetment unless the person thus present holds some position of rank or influence such that his countenancing what takes place may, under the circumstances, be held a direct encouragement or unless some specific duty of prevention rests on him, which he leaves unfulfilled in such wise that he may be safely taken as having joined in conspiracy for perpetration of the offence.²¹ An offence of abetment by presence falls through, if the principal offence is not substantiated.²² A priest who officiated at a bigamous marriage was held to have intentionally aided it, but not the persons who were merely present at the celebration or who permitted its celebration in their house, when such permission afforded no particular facility for the act.²³ Where in a murder case a co-accused stated that she remained an unwilling spectator while the offence was being committed by the other accused, it was held that the alleged omission of a co-accused to intervene or raise an alarm did not constitute an abetment of murder, inasmuch as her inaction did not constitute criminality.²⁴

Cases.—Lending house to extort confession.—A zemindar who had lodged a complaint of theft lent a house belonging to him to the police-officer who was conducting the investigation in the theft case for the purposes of such investigation. It was found that at the time of lending the house the zemindar knew that it was likely to be used for the purpose of putting illegal pressure upon persons suspected of complicity in or knowledge of the theft, and also that the zemindar was at times present while the police-officer was engaged in that house in torturing certain persons summoned there by him, though he did not actually take part in the torturing. It was held that the zemindar was, by virtue of Explanation 2, guilty of doing an act in order to facilitate the commission of an offence under s. 330.²⁵

Ordering assault.—Where orders were given to assault a particular person, who died in consequence of the injuries inflicted, the person giving the orders was held guilty of abetting the commission of voluntarily causing grievous hurt.¹ But if no definite orders were given there would be no abetment.²

Giving weapon to hurt another.—Where A gave a dao (an edged weapon) to B, who had given out his intention to coerce the party against whom he was acting, and who inflicted grievous hurt on such party with the dao, A was held guilty of abetment in the commission of that act.³

Acceptance of unstamped receipt.—Where a debtor paid a sum of money to his creditor, and asked for a stamped receipt from him, who had not at hand a stamp, and then accepted an unstamped receipt, saying he would affix a stamp thereto, which he did not do, it was held that this did not constitute abetment of the offence of giving an unstamped receipt because he had done or omitted nothing which it was in his power to effect.⁴

Attestation or writing of document.—G, a prostitute, purchased a child for purposes of prostitution: at her request the first accused wrote a document evidencing the transaction; the other three accused attested the document, and all the four accused were present when the child was handed over to G. G also put into the hands of the first accused the price of the child, which money he handed over to the child's mother. It was held that the accused could not be convicted for abetment by intentionally aiding the illegal disposal of the child under s. 372.⁵

Act abetted illegal but not offence.—A guardian of a Mahomedan married a female infant aged six years who caused a marriage ceremony to be gone through in her name with another man, during the lifetime of her husband, but in her absence and without her consent, was held not to have committed the offence of abetting bigamy.⁶ Because to constitute abetment the accused must be proved either to have instigated or aided some person to commit an offence. This case has been distinguished in a subsequent case in which a Hindu having given his daughter, said to be eight years old, in marriage to a certain person, again gave her in marriage to another in the lifetime of her first husband. It was held that he was guilty of an offence under s. 109 read with s. 494, although his daughter had not the knowledge and intelligence necessary to enable her to commit an offence under s. 494.⁷

(b) By illegal omission.—To prove abetment by 'illegal omission', it is necessary to show that the accused intentionally aided the commission of the offence

by his non-interference,⁸ and the omission involved a breach of a legal obligation.⁹ Thus every police-officer is bound to shelter a person in custody, and to arrest persons committing assaults likely to cause grievous bodily injury and if he omits to perform this duty, he is guilty of abetment.¹⁰ Where at a public meeting an unknown person committed an offence under the Calcutta Police Act, 1866, by the blowing of a bugle and the evidence showed that the accused, who was the president of the meeting, had not arranged for the blowing of the bugle and that he had no knowledge that the bugle would be blown at intervals, it was held that the accused could not be convicted on a charge of abetment under s. 109. Failure to request the blower of the bugle to desist would not amount to an intentional aiding of the blowing of the bugle after it had been prohibited by the police.¹¹

Cases.—Non-interference where there is duty to interfere.—A village Magistrate, who was present while certain police constables were wrongfully confining and causing hurt to a resident of the village to extort a confession and who did not interfere with nor stop the criminal acts committed in his presence nor report them to a Magistrate, was held guilty of abetment of offences under ss. 330 and 348 of the Penal Code.¹² But the mere fact that the offence of extortion was committed in the presence of a village chowkidar without eliciting any disapproval on his part was held not to render him liable as an abettor.¹³ Where a head constable, who knew that certain persons were likely to be tortured for the purpose of extorting confession, purposely kept out of the way, it was held that he was guilty of abetment.¹⁴

Omission must be of legal obligation.—A motor car was driven by the chauffeur of the accused, on a road in Mahabaleshwar, driving over which was forbidden under s. 9 of the Motor Vehicles Act (Bom. II of 1904). The accused was at Poona then but was convicted of abetment of the offence under s. 18 of the Act on the ground that it was his duty to inform the driver of the existence of the prohibition. It was held on revision by the High Court that as no legal obligation was imposed on the accused to instruct his servant he was not liable.¹⁵ Where it was not proved that accused's intention in omitting to report a plot, under s. 44 of the Criminal Procedure Code, was with a view to aiding the waging of war, it was held that the accused could not be convicted of the offence of abetment of waging war.¹⁶ A and B entered into a conspiracy that B should falsely personate X, and withdraw money held in deposit at the Collectorate. A wrote a letter to C saying that B was X, and C on the faith of this assurance and in good faith identified B as X at the treasury and B withdrew the amount. It was held that the mere failure on the part of C to inform the treasury officer that he was identifying X only on the assurance of A did not amount to an illegal omission within the meaning of this section, and C could not be convicted for abetment of cheating by personation unless he knew that the man whom he identified was not X.¹⁷

Attempt.—The abetment of an offence, within the meaning of s. 40, being itself an offence punishable under this Chapter, an attempt to commit the offence of abetment is provided for in s. 511, and there is therefore no legal obstacle to punishing such offence.¹⁸

English law.—According to English law, criminals are divided into four classes. The distinction is based on the consideration whether a party was present or absent at the commission of the offence.

(1) Principal in the first degree.—One who is the actual perpetrator of the crime. It is not necessary that he should be actually present when the offence is consummated; thus one who lays poison or a trap for another is a principal in the first degree. Nor need the deed be done by the principal's own hands ; for it will suffice if it is done through an innocent agent, as for instance, if one incites a child or a mad-man to murder. Even an animal may be employed as an innocent agent. For example, a person who sets a dog upon people is himself guilty of assaulting them.

(2) Principal in the second degree.—One by whom the actual perpetrator of the crime is aided and abetted at the very time when it is committed. He may or may not be actually present at the scene of the crime. It will suffice, if he has the intention of giving assistance, and is sufficiently near to give the assistance : as when one is watching outside, while others are committing a felony inside the house; or seconds in a prize-fight which ends fatally. An aider or abettor is only liable for such crimes committed by the principal in the first degree as were done in execution of their common purpose.

Both the above classes of principals are liable to the same punishment.

(3) Accessory before the fact.—One who being absent at the time when the felony is committed, yet procures, counsels, commands, or abets another to commit a felony. He is punishable in all respects as the principal felon. If present at the commission he would be a principal.

(4) Accessory after the fact.—One who, knowing a felony to have been committed by another, receives, relieves, comforts, assists, harbours or maintains the felon.

A felony must be actually committed, or there cannot be any accessories.

Principals are dealt with in the Penal Code under ss. 34 to 38. There is no distinction between 'principals in the first degree' and 'principals in the second degree,' in the Code. Under English law this distinction is confined to felonies only. It does not exist in cases of misdemeanour or serious offences as high treason or forgery.

The offence of abetment corresponds as nearly as one word can be said to correspond to another to the offence which is known in England of being an 'accessory before the fact.' But mere concurrence—that kind of passive concurrence which is known in England as being an 'accessory after the fact'—is not abetment and is not to be treated as abetment.

'Accessory after the fact' is treated in scattered sections. See provisions relating to harbouring, ss. 52A, 212, 216; and, also ss. 130, 136, 137, 410-414.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Where there is reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have conspired together to commit an offence or an actionable wrong, anything said, done or written by any one of such persons in reference to their common intention, after the time when such intention was first entertained by any one of them, is a relevant fact as against each of the persons believed to be so conspiring, as well for the purpose of proving the existence of the conspiracy as for the purpose of showing that any such person was a party to it.¹⁹ 'Conspiracy' is a fact which even in a criminal case can be inferred from circumstantial or oral evidence.²⁰ A conspiracy may be proved by other than oral evidence : it may be proved by the evidence of surrounding circumstances and the conduct of the accused both before and after the alleged commission of the crime.²¹ Direct evidence of conspiracy is hardly ever adduced but unlawful conspiracy is to be inferred from the conduct of the parties.²²

In order to convict a person of abetting the commission of a crime, it is not only necessary to prove that he has taken part in those steps of the transaction which are innocent, but in some way or other it is absolutely necessary to connect him with those steps of the transaction which are criminal.²³ It is necessary to prove criminal intention against the accused. The finding that accused No. 1 could not have acted in the illegal way without the approval and connivance of accused No. 2 is not sufficient to prove abetment.²⁴

Procedure.—A person, having been charged with a substantive offence, can be convicted for abetment thereof if the facts justify such conviction. The principle is that, if evidence adduced in support of the charge for the substantive offence does not give notice to the accused of all the facts which constitute abetment, he cannot be convicted of abetment. A person can be convicted of abetment without a separate charge, where the circumstances bring the case under s. 237 of the Criminal Procedure Code.²⁵ But if on facts the accused may be charged with the principal offence, and abetment, he may be convicted of abetment though only charged with the principal offence.¹

In the light of the decision of the Privy Council in *Begu v. Emperor*² the cases which laid down that on a charge of a substantive offence the accused could not be convicted of the abetment of that offence are no longer of any authority.³

The second clause of this section read with the definition of 'conspiracy' in s. 120-A makes it clear, that the Crown has a right to file a prosecution under s. 120B whether or not in pursuance of the conspiracy to commit an offence the offence takes place. If it does take place, the prosecution have the option to treat the person who has conspired with another as an abettor within the meaning of this section. Where in a case there was evidence of criminal conspiracy between some persons to make a false statement in an affidavit and a false statement was in fact made in the affidavit in pursuance of that conspiracy, it was held that the Crown has the option to prosecute a conspirator for abetment upon the actual commission of the offence in pursuance of the conspiracy, and that the question of previous complaint or consent required by s. 196A, Criminal Procedure Code, did not arise.⁴

Separate sentences.—Where in pursuance of a conspiracy to commit an offence, that offence is committed, separate convictions may be had under s. 120B and for the offence committed. But if the time between the commission of two offences is short only one sentence may be awarded.⁵

108. A person abets¹ an offence, who abets either the commission of an offence, or the commission of an act² which would be an offence, if committed by a person capable by law of committing an offence with the same intention or knowledge as that of the abettor.

Abettor

Explanation 1.³—The abetment of the illegal omission of an act may amount to an offence although the abettor may not himself be bound to do that act.

Explanation 2.⁴—To constitute the offence of abetment it is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed, or that the effect requisite to constitute the offence should be caused.

Explanation 3.⁵—It is not necessary that the person abetted should be capable by law of committing an offence, or that he should have the same guilty intention or knowledge as that of the abettor, or any guilty intention or knowledge.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A, with a guilty intention, abets a child or a lunatic to commit an act which would be an offence, if committed by a person capable by law of committing an offence, and having the same intention as A. Here A, whether the act be committed or not, is guilty of abetting an offence.

(b) A, with the intention of murdering Z, instigates B, a child under seven years of age, to do an act which causes Z's death. B, in consequence of the abetment, does the act in the absence of A and thereby causes Z's death. Here, though B was not capable by law of committing an offence, A is liable to be punished in the same manner as if B had been capable by law of committing an offence, and had committed murder, and he is therefore subject to the punishment of death.

(c) A instigates B to set fire to a dwelling-house. B, in consequence of the unsoundness of his mind, being incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is wrong or contrary to law, sets fire to the house in consequence of A's instigation. B has committed no offence, but A is guilty of abetting the offence of setting fire to a dwelling-house, and is liable to the punishment provided for that offence.

(d) A, intending to cause a theft to be committed, instigates B to take property belonging to Z out of Z's possession. A induces B to believe that the property belongs to A. B takes the property out of Z's possession, in good faith, believing it to be A's property. B, acting under this misconception, does not take dishonestly, and therefore does not commit theft. But A is guilty of abetting theft, and is liable to the same punishment as if B had committed theft.

Explanation 4.—The abetment of an offence being an offence, the abetment of such an abetment is also an offence.

ILLUSTRATION.

A instigates B to instigate C to murder Z. B accordingly instigates C to murder Z, and C commits that offence in consequence of B's instigation. B is liable to be punished for his offence with the punishment for murder; and, as A instigated B to commit the offence, A is also liable to the same punishment.

Explanation 5.—It is not necessary to the commission of the offence of abetment by conspiracy that the abettor should concert the offence with the person who commits it. It is sufficient if he engages in the conspiracy in pursuance of which the offence is committed.

ILLUSTRATION.

A consents with B a plan for poisoning Z. It is agreed that A shall administer the poison. B then explains the plan to C, mentioning that a third person is to administer the poison, but without mentioning A's name. C agrees to procure the poison, and procures and delivers it to B for the purpose of its being used in the manner explained. A administers the poison; Z dies in consequence. Here, though A and C have not conspired together, yet C has been engaged in the conspiracy in pursuance of which Z has been murdered. C has therefore committed the offence defined in this section, and is liable to the punishment for murder.

COMMENT.

'Abettor' under this section means the person who abets (1) the commission of an offence, or (2) the commission of an act which would be an offence if committed by a person not suffering from any physical or mental incapacity. In the light of the preceding section he must be an instigator or a conspirator or an intentional helper. This section is in conformity with the English law except on one point. Under English law a person using an innocent agent as his tool is deemed to be a principal whereas under this section he is treated as an abettor. So far as the actual result is concerned this distinction has not much meaning.

1. 'Abets'.—See s. 107, supra. In order to convict a person of abetting the commission of a crime, it is not only necessary to prove that he has taken part in those steps of the transaction which are innocent, but in some way or other it is absolutely necessary to connect him with those steps of the transaction which are criminal.⁶

2. 'Commission of an act.'—There must be abetment of the commission of an act. The section does not contemplate any act of subsequent abetment. Thus, a person cannot be convicted of abetment of a false charge solely on the ground of his having given evidence in support of such charge.⁷

An act done after an offence is complete which might help the offender does not amount to abetment.⁸

3. Explanation. 1.—If a public servant is guilty of an illegal omission of duty made punishable by the Code, and a private person instigates him he abets the offence of which such public servant is guilty, although the abettor, being a private person, could not himself have been guilty of that offence.

4. Explanation 2.—The offence of abetment is complete notwithstanding that the person abetted refuses to do the thing, or fails involuntarily in doing it, or does it and the expected result does not follow. The offence of abetment by instigation depends upon the intention of the person who abets; and not upon the act which is actually done by the person whom he abets.⁹ If it was impossible to accomplish the commission of an offence in a way suggested by the abettor and no offence is committed then the abettor would not be liable.

'Effect requisite to constitute the offence, etc.'—An offence can be abetted though the means which are intended to be employed are such that it is physically impossible that the effect requisite to constitute the offence should be caused by them.¹⁰ Where, therefore, the accused offered money for the killing or disabling of the deceased by means of charms and it was left to the persons who were to earn the money to decide whether their victim was to be killed or disabled, it was held that he was guilty of abetment of murder.¹¹ In a Bombay case a doubt has been expressed whether abetment of murder by sorcery or other impossible means is an offence under the Code.¹²

5. Explanation 3.—This Explanation makes it clear that the person abetted need not have any guilty intention in committing the act. It applies to abetment generally and there is nothing to indicate that it applies only to abetment by instigation and not to other kinds of abetment. The illustrations are not intended to be exhaustive.¹³ If a man does, by means of an innocent agent, an act which amounts to a crime, the employer, and not the agent, is accountable for the act.¹⁴ Illustrations (b), (c) and (d) exemplify this explanation. R sold to D certain trees which in fact and to the knowledge of R, though not to the knowledge of D, belonged to a third person. The trees were sold to D with the intention that they should be cut down and taken away. It was held that R committed the offence of abetment of theft.¹⁵

'Guilty intention or knowledge.'—The offence of abetment depends upon the intention of the person who abets and not upon the knowledge or intention of the person he employs to act for him. A person may be guilty of abetment even though the person whom he has abetted is not guilty because his act which would have been a criminal act if it had been done with guilty intention or knowledge has not been shown to have been done with such intention or knowledge.¹⁶

English law.—If the person abetted does not know that the act is illegal he is considered as an innocent agent only, and the abettor is held liable as a principal.

6. Explanation 4.—According to this Explanation a person may himself be an abettor by the intervention of a third person, without any direct communication between himself and the person employed to do the thing.

'Abetment of an offence being an offence.'—These words do not mean "when an abetment of an offence is actually committed" but that, when the abetment of an offence is by definition or description an offence under the Penal Code, that is, when an abetment of an offence is punishable under s. 109 or s. 116 or other provision of the Code, then the abetment of such abetment is also an offence. Where S instigated K, a bench clerk in the Court of M, a Presidency Magistrate, to instigate the latter to accept an illegal gratification for acquitting an accused in a case and granting sanction against the complainant in the case, and K received such gratification as a police-spy, and intending to get S arrested, and did not in fact instigate M to accept the same, it was held that S was guilty of the abetment of bribery under s. 161 read with s. 116.¹⁷ The accused paid Rs 15 to V to be handed over to a medical officer as a bribe. V did not pay the amount to the officer. On the complaint against V by the accused, V was convicted of misappropriation. The accused was subsequently prosecuted on the charge of abetting the commission by V of the offence of bribing a public servant. It was held that he was guilty of abetment of an offence under s. 161 read with s. 116. The defence that the offence which he abetted was not committed would not be tenable in view of Explanations 2 and 4 to this section.¹⁸

'Abetment of such abetment.'—It is not necessary to an indictment for the abetment of an abetment of an offence to show that such offence was actually committed.¹⁹ The abetment of an abetment of an offence is no more and no less than the abetment of the offence. A person may constitute himself an abettor by the intervention of a third person without any direct communication between himself and the person employed to do the thing, and in the case of abetment by conspiracy, it is not necessary that the abettor should concert the offence with the person who commits it. It is sufficient if he engages in the conspiracy in pursuance of which the offence is committed.²⁰

A sought the aid of B with the intention of committing a theft of the property of B's master. B, with the knowledge and consent of his master, and for the purpose of procuring A's punishment, aided A in carrying out his object. It was held that though the offence of theft had not been committed yet A was liable for abetment of theft.²¹ Where the accused asked a native doctor to supply her with medicine for the purpose of poisoning her son-in-law, it was held that the offence committed might be treated as an instigating of the doctor to abet the accused in the commission of the murder, and, with reference to this Explanation, might have been punished under ss. 116 and 302.²²

7. Explanation. 5.—This Explanation applies to abetment by conspiracy.²³ It is not necessary that all persons joining in any conspiracy must be aware of every secret or every minute detail. When the number of persons conspiring to do a particular act is very large there will be a few amongst them who will plot and plan, and though the others are not fully cognizant of all facts yet their liability is not at all lessened. Where two persons were indicted for making and engraving a plate for the purposes of forgery, and it was proved that one of them gave the order for the manufacture of the plate to an innocent agent, who never saw the other until it was completed, it was held that they were both correctly charged as principals.²⁴

Mere knowledge.—Mere subsequent knowledge of the offence is insufficient to constitute abetment.²⁵ And mere knowledge of a design on the part of another to commit an offence and speaking to that other about it without evidence that the person aware of the design instigated the other by word or deed to commit the offence, does not constitute abetment.¹

Principal cannot be abettor.—A person who has been convicted of an offence as principal cannot also be punished for abetting it.²

PRACTICE.

The offence of abetment is a substantive one, and the conviction of an abettor is, therefore, in no way dependent on the conviction of the principal.³

108A. A person abets an offence within the meaning of this Code who, in British India, abets the commission of any act without and beyond British India which would constitute an offence if committed in British India.

Abetment in British India of offences outside it.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, in British India, instigates B, a foreigner in Goa, to commit a murder in Goa. A is guilty of abetting murder.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section was added by Act IV of 1898, s. 3. It provides for the punishment of abetment of the commission of an offence outside British India. The Select Committee in their Report observed: “We have made it an offence for a person in British India to abet any act which would be an offence if committed in British India, but, as a fact, is committed outside. In short, to put it in popular language, we have extended the law of abetment of offences committed outside British India. It has been held by the Bombay High Court that if a person in British India abetted or incited a murder in Goa, he would not be guilty of any offence. We have come to the conclusion that he ought to be deemed guilty of an offence, and that India is not to be made an alsatia for instigators of crime.”⁴

The section provides for the difficulty discussed in Gunpatrao Ramchandra's case⁵ in which it was held that an abetment in British India by a British subject of an offence committed in a foreign territory was not an offence punishable under the Penal Code, and could not, therefore, be tried by a Court in British India. Under the section it is essential that the offence abetted shall be an offence recognized in British India and that its abetment shall be complete in British India.

The section contemplates that the abetment shall be completed in British India. If the act committed in British India amounts to preparation only it will not be punishable. The Illustration is, however, not very clear. If A is in British India and B in Pondicherry, A can only abet an offence by him either by a letter or some other mode of communication. Even if the letter be written in British India yet until it reaches B it can hardly be said that B has been instigated. If the instigation, in fact, takes place when the letter reaches B, then the instigation has taken place in Pondicherry and not in British India.

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—No Court shall take cognizance of any offence punishable under this section unless upon complaint made by order of Government.⁶

Punishment of abetment if the act abetted is committed in consequence and where no express provision is made for its punishment.

109. Whoever abets any offence¹ shall, if the act abetted is committed² in consequence of the abetment, and no express provision³ is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment, be punished with the punishment provided for the offence.

Explanation.—An act or offence is said to be committed in consequence of abetment, when it is committed in consequence of the instigation, or in pursuance of the conspiracy, or with the aid which constitutes the abetment.

(a) A offers a bribe to B, a public servant, as a reward for showing A some favour in the exercise of B's official functions. B accepts the bribe. A has abetted the offence defined in section 161.

(b) A instigates B to give false evidence. B, in consequence of the instigation, commits that offence. A is guilty of abetting that offence, and is liable to the same punishment as B.

(c) A and B conspire to poison Z. A, in pursuance of the conspiracy, procures the poison and delivers it to B in order that he may administer it to Z. B, in pursuance of the conspiracy, administers the poison to Z in A's absence and thereby causes Z's death. Here B is guilty of murder. A is guilty of abetting that offence by conspiracy, and is liable to the punishment for murder.

COMMENT.

Under this section the abettor is liable to any punishment which may be inflicted on the principal offender, (1) if the act of the latter is committed in consequence of the abetment, and (2) no express provision is made in the Code for the punishment of such an abetment. This section lays down nothing more than that if the Code has not separately provided for the punishment of an abetment as such then it is punishable with the punishment provided for the original offence.⁷

A person who aids and abets the actual preparation of the crime at the very time when it is committed, is a principal of the second degree and comes under this section.⁸ Active abetment at the time of committing the offence is covered by this section.⁹

This section is applicable to cases under s. 182.¹⁰

1. 'Abets any offence.'—See s. 40, supra. The law does not require that instigation should be in a particular form or that it should be only in words and may not be by conduct. Whether there was instigation or not is a question to be decided on the facts of each case. It is not necessary in law for the prosecution to prove that the actual operative cause in the mind of the person abetted was instigation and nothing else, so long as there was instigation and the offence has been committed or the offence would have been committed if the person committing the act had the same knowledge and intention as the abettor.¹¹ Where the accused was nowhere near the scene of occurrence the mere facts that the unlawful assembly consisted mostly of his servants or tenants and that its common object was to do something which was in the interests of the accused, cannot lead to the conclusion that the accused must necessarily have ordered or instigated the formation of this unlawful assembly or the commission of this crime. Servants and partisans, not unoften, on their own responsibility, do things which they consider to be in the interests of their masters or principals without the latter's knowledge or consent.¹²

Abetment of an offence under a local law (e.g. Mad. Act V of 1920) is an offence falling within the purview of this section.¹³ But abetment of a breach of the bye-laws framed under a local Act is not an abetment of an offence within the meaning of this section unless the breach of the bye-laws is made punishable under the local Act.¹⁴

2. 'Is committed.'—Under this section the act abetted should be committed in consequence of the abetment,¹⁵ or in pursuance of the conspiracy (see Explanation). Assisting in the preparation of an offence which leads to nothing does not amount to an abetment under this section.¹⁶ Offering gratification as a reward or motive to withdraw a case against the accused under the Motor Car Act, which had already been dismissed, was held not to amount to an abetment of an offence under s. 161.¹⁷

3. 'No express provision.'—This section only applies to those cases of abetment about which 'no express provision is made by this Code.' Hence it does not apply to abetting the waging of war, ss. 121, 122, 123; to abetting the escape of State prisoners, s. 130; to abetting mutiny, s. 132; to abetting an assault of a soldier, sailor or airman on his superior officer, s. 134; and to abetting insubordination by the same, s. 138.

CASES.

Homicide.—In a case of suttee, A ordered the pile to be lighted, B did not then assist but afterwards when the woman fled from the pile induced her to return. A was held guilty of abetment of culpable homicide, but B of abetment of suicide only.¹⁸ The accused accompanied his brother who was taking a child to murder it; after accompanying him for a while he refused further to go along with his brother, but at the same time, though knowing full well that the child was being taken to be murdered, he made no attempt to take the child back with him and the child was subsequently murdered. It was held that the accused was guilty of murder.¹⁹ G and two others were charged under s. 304 of the Penal Code. The evidence showed that one of G's companions was armed with a spear and the other with a lathi; that G gave the order to "beat" P; and that the two others thereupon assaulted P so that he died of his injuries. It was contended that the order given by G did not include an order to assault P with a spear, and, therefore, that he could be convicted only of abetting the offence of causing hurt and not of abetting the offence under s. 304. It was held that G was rightly convicted under ss. 304/109 of the Penal Code.²⁰ It was found that two accused and the approver conspired to commit theft and in pursuance of that conspiracy to kill in order to enable them to commit theft but there was no direct evidence as to who dealt the fatal blow. It was held that the accused were guilty of abetment of murder under s. 302 read with s. 109.²¹

Assault.—Where a person merely said "beat" but did not take any part himself in beating, it was held that he was guilty of abetting the offence under s. 352.²²

Forgery.—Where a person took active part in the preparation of a document, but no part in the forgery of the name of the executant, it was held that he was not guilty of forgery, but simply of abetment of that offence.²³

Marrying married girl.—Where a Hindu having given his daughter, eight years old, in marriage to a certain person, again gave her in marriage to another in the lifetime of her first husband, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section read with s. 494, although his daughter had not the knowledge and intelligence necessary to enable her to commit an offence under s. 494.²⁴

Abetment of kidnapping.—Where a Hindu woman left her husband's house, taking with her her infant daughter, and went to the house of A, and on the same day the daughter was married to B, the brother of A, without her father's consent, it was held that A was rightly convicted under this section and s. 363 of abetting the offence of kidnapping which was committed by the mother of the girl.²⁵ The Allahabad High Court has not accepted this view. One C, by making certain false representations to the mother of J, a married girl of eleven years of age, induced her to part with the custody of her daughter. C took the girl away from her own village to a neighbouring village where she was joined by one T. Thence C and T took the girl about with them from place to place making unsuccessful attempts to dispose of her in marriage, until they were arrested by a chowkidar of Tiabpur, on his being informed that an attempt was made to sell the girl in that village. Upon these findings C was convicted of the offence punishable under s. 366 and T of abetment of that offence, following the rule in

Samia Kaundan.¹ On appeal to the High Court, the appeal of C was summarily rejected. As to T it was held, dissenting from Samia Kaundan and agreeing with the view taken in *Ram Sundar*² and Rakhal Nikari,³ that the offence of kidnapping having been completed so soon as the minor was actually taken out of the custody of her guardian, T could not properly be convicted of abetment on the hypothesis that the offence was a continuing one. But, inasmuch as there was evidence on the record that the assistance given by T in attempting to dispose of J was the result of a conspiracy entered into before the kidnapping took place, the conviction of T for abetment of kidnapping was sustained.⁴ The former Chief Court of the Punjab held that there could be no abetment of the offence of kidnapping after the person had once been taken out of the keeping of the lawful guardian.⁵ A married woman cannot abet her own abduction under s. 498.⁶

Using forged document.—Where a party to a judicial proceeding relied on a forged document in support of his case, and a witness stated that he saw the execution of the document by the person by whom it purported to have been executed, it was held that the witness intentionally aided by his deposition the using of the document as genuine and was liable to prosecution for an offence under s. 471 read with this section although he could not be charged with abetment of the forgery itself.⁷

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—To substantiate a charge under this section it is necessary to show intentional aid by some act or illegal omission.⁸ It is necessary to prove abetment, and that the act abetted was committed in consequence of the abetment.

Procedure.—The general procedure for cases of abetment is in accordance with that for the offence abetted. Abetments therefore are cognizable or non-cognizable, bailable or non-bailable, compoundable or non-compoundable, according to the procedure for the offence abetted. Where the Court is dealing with a charge of abetment of a specific offence which offence is a summons case, then the abetment is also a summons case. An offence under s. 117 of the Penal Code read with s. 17 (1), Criminal Law Amendment Act, can, therefore, be tried as a summons case.⁹

Conspiracy is one form of abetment and where the offence is alleged to have been committed by more than two persons, such of them as actually took part in the commission should be charged with the substantive offence, while those who are alleged to have abetted it by conspiracy should be charged with the offence of abetment under this section.¹⁰

Jurisdiction.—A charge of abetment may be inquired into or tried either by the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the abetment was committed, or by the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the offence abetted was committed.¹¹ The Court competent to try the offence of abetment is the Court declared competent to try the offence abetted.

Summary trial.—Whether an abetment is triable summarily or not, depends upon whether the offence abetted is triable summarily or not.¹²

Joint trial.—An abettor may be tried either jointly with, or separately from, the principal offender.¹³

Complaint.—Under sub-section (4) of s. 195, Criminal Procedure Code, a complaint in writing is necessary for the prosecution of a person who abets any of the offences referred to in sub-section (1).

Section 196A of the Criminal Procedure Code applies only to a prosecution for conspiracy punishable under s. 120B, and not for abetment by conspiracy punishable under this section.¹⁴

Sentence.—A sentence of less than transportation for life is not a legal sentence for abetment of murder under s. 302 and this section when the offence of murder is actually committed in consequence of the abetment. The legal punishment for such abetment is the punishment provided for murder.¹⁵

It is irregular to convict and punish a person for abetment of theft, and at the same time to convict and punish him for receiving the stolen property.¹⁶

Charge.—In a charge of abetment, the section of the principal offence, and the particular section of this Chapter under which the case falls should be mentioned with the circumstances which brings it under the said section.¹⁷

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you———as follows :

That XY (if the person is not known say that an unknown person) on the ——day of———, at———, committed the offence of———, and that you at———, abetted the said XY (or person unknown) in the commission of the said offence of———, which was committed in consequence of your abetment, and you have thereby committed an offence punishable under ss. 109 and———of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (omit the words "by the said Court" in cases tried by Magistrate)] on the said charge.

When the abettor is charged with the person committing the offence the charge should run thus :—

That you———, on or about the———day of———, at———, abetted the commission of the offence of———by———which was committed in consequence of your abetment, and that you have thereby committed an offence punishable under ss. 109 and———of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of my Court [or the Court of Session].

110. Whoever abets the commission of an offence¹ shall, if the person abetted does the act with a different intention or knowledge from that of the abettor, be punished with the punishment provided for the offence which would have been committed if the act had been done with the intention or knowledge of the abettor and with no other.

Punishment of abetment if person abetted does act with different intention from that of abettor.

COMMENT.

This section says that though the person abetted commits the offence with a different intention or knowledge yet the abettor will be punished with the punishment provided for the offence abetted. The liability of the person abetted is not affected by this section.

Explanation 3 to s. 108 bears relation to this section. See ill. (d).

1. 'Offence'.—Offence under this section denotes a thing punishable under this Code, or under any special or local law (s. 40).

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—Same as that for the offence abetted.

111. When an act is abetted¹ and a different act is done, the abettor is liable for the act done, in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had directly abetted it :

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A instigates a child to put poison into the food of Z, and gives him poison for that purpose. The child, in consequence of the instigation, by mistake puts the poison into the food of Y, which is by the side of that of Z. Here if the child was acting under the influence of A's instigation, and the act done was under the circumstances a probable consequence of the abetment, A is liable in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had instigated the child to put the poison into the food of Y.

(b) A instigates B to burn Z's house. B sets fire to the house and at the same time commits theft of property there. A, though guilty of abetting the burning of the house, is not guilty of abetting the theft; for the theft was a distinct act, and not a probable consequence of the burning.

(c) A instigates B and C to break into an inhabited house at midnight for the purpose of robbery, and provides them with arms for that purpose. B and C break into the house, and being resisted by Z, one of the inmates, murder Z. Here, if that murder was the probable consequence of the abetment, A is liable to the punishment provided for murder.

COMMENT.

Principle.—This section proceeds on the maxim “every man is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his act.” The main provision of the section is applicable only when the act done is the probable consequence of the abetment.¹⁸

“If one man instigates another to perpetrate a particular crime, and that other, in pursuance of such instigation, not only perpetrates that crime, but, in the course of doing so, commits another crime in furtherance of it, the former is criminally responsible as an abettor in respect of such last-mentioned crime, if it is one which, as a reasonable man, he must, at the time of the instigation, have known would, in the ordinary course of things, probably have to be committed in order to carry out the original crime. For example, if A says to B :—‘You waylay C on such and such a road and rob him, and if he resists, use this sword, but not more than is absolutely necessary;’ and B kills C, A is responsible as an abettor of the killing, for it was a probable consequence of the instigation. To put it in plain terms, the law virtually says to a man :—‘If you choose to run the risk of putting another in motion to do an unlawful act, he, for the time being, represents you as much as he does himself; and if, in order to effect the accomplishment of that act, he does another which you may fairly from the circumstances be presumed to have foreseen would be a probable consequence of your instigation, you are as much responsible for abetting the latter act as the former’ ”.¹⁹

Foster²⁰ says : “If the principal totally and substantially varies, if being solicited to commit a felony of one kind he wilfully and knowingly commits a felony of another, he will stand single in that offence, and the person soliciting will not be involved in his guilt. ... But if the principal in substance complies with the temptation, varying only in circumstance of time or place, or in the manner of execution, in these cases the persons soliciting to the offence will, if absent, be an accessory before the fact, if present a principal... A commands B to murder C by poison, B does it by a sword, or other weapon, or by any other means. A is accessory to this murder : for the murder of C was the object principally in his contemplation, and that is effected. So where the principal goes beyond the terms of the solicitation, if in the event the felony committed was a probable consequence of what was ordered or advised, the person giving such orders or advice will be an accessory to that felony. A, upon some affront given by B, orders his servant to waylay him and give him a sound beating; the servant does so, and B dies of this beating. A is accessory to this murder ... A solicits B to burn the house of C; he does it; and the flames taking hold of the house of D that likewise is burnt. A is accessory to the burning of this latter house. These cases are all governed by one and the same principle. The advice, solicitation, or orders in substance were pursued, and were extremely flagitious on the part of A. The events, though possibly falling out beyond his original intention, were in the ordinary course of things the probable consequences of what B did under the influence, and at the instigation of A. And therefore, in the justice of the law, he is answerable for them."

1. 'When an act is abetted.'—The definition of abetment in s. 107 includes not merely instigation, which is the normal form of abetment, but also conspiracy and aiding, and those three forms of abetment are dealt with in the proviso to this section. Where, therefore, an act is abetted, and the abetment takes the form of instigation of an act, and a different act is done, that different act must be a probable consequence, and committed under the influence of instigation; and where the abetment takes the form of aiding or a conspiracy the different act must be a probable consequence and also with the aid or in pursuance of the conspiracy.²¹

2. 'Probable consequence.'—Under this section an abettor may be liable for the commission of a different act than the one he instigated, provided the different act was a probable consequence of the abetment and was committed under the influence of the instigation. A probable consequence of an act is one which is likely or which can reasonably be expected to follow from such act; an unusual or unexpected consequence cannot be described as a probable one. When the act done is different from the act instigated, an abettor is only liable for such a different act if it was a likely consequence of the instigation or if it was an act which the instigator could reasonably have been expected to foresee might be committed as a result of his instigation.²² An unusual or expected consequence cannot be described as a probable one. The test of guilt in charges of abetment must always be whether, having regard to the immediate object of the instigation or conspiracy, the act done by the principal is one which, according to ordinary experience and common sense, the abettor must have foreseen as probable. But it is sufficient for a conviction if the act done was a probable consequence of the abetment. It is not necessary that the abettor should know it to be a probable consequence.²³

See illustrations to this section, but the act done must have been committed in pursuance of the conspiracy.²⁴ The illustrations show that the section contemplates cases not only where a different act is done but also where a different person is attacked in pursuance of the conspiracy.²⁵

CASES.

Where several persons turned out to beat a man, but one of them killed him, it was held that as the intention of all of them was to beat him only they would be liable for grievous hurt, but the killing of the deceased went so far beyond the common purpose that it could not be said to have been a probable consequence of the abetment.¹ Where A ordered B and C to seize and forcibly take D in the contemplation of an assault upon D, and D was so beaten and tortured as to have died in consequence, it was held that A was guilty at least of abetting the commission of voluntarily causing grievous hurt.² B and C instigated A to rob the deceased on his return home after receiving a sum of money : whereupon A killed the deceased. A was convicted of murder and B and C of abetment of murder under this section and s. 302. But the High Court altered the convictions of B and C to those under ss. 109 and 392.³ Where A instigated B, who had a lathi in his hand, to chastise or thrash C, but B stabbed C with a spear-head of the existence of which A was unaware, and C died, it was held that the act of stabbing, which was different from the act of thrashing which was the act instigated, was not a probable consequence of the instigation to thrash, and A was guilty of abetment of assault only and not of abetment of murder.⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused abetted the commission of a particular act.

(2) That the act actually committed was done under the influence of such abetment.

(3) That the act done was a probable consequence of the abetment.

Procedure.—Same as that for the offence abetted.⁵

112. If the act for which the abettor is liable under the last preceding section is committed in addition to the act abetted, and constitutes a distinct offence,¹ the abettor is liable to punishment for each of the offences.

Abettor when liable to cumulative punishment for act abetted and for act done.

ILLUSTRATION.

A instigates B to resist by force a distress made by a public servant. B, in consequence, resists that distress. In offering the resistance, B voluntarily causes grievous hurt to the officer executing the distress. As B has committed both the offence of resisting the distress, and the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt, B is liable to punishment for both these offences; and, if A knew that B was likely voluntarily to cause grievous hurt in resisting the distress. A will also be liable to punishment for each of the offences.

COMMENT.

This section is a further extension of the principle enunciated in the preceding section; it is much wider than the English law on the point. Under it the abettor is punished for the offence abetted as well as the offence committed.

1. 'Offence.'—See s. 40, supra.

113. When an act is abetted with the intention on the part of the abettor of causing a particular effect, and an act for which the abettor is liable in consequence of the abetment, causes a different effect from that intended by the abettor, the abettor is liable for the effect caused, in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had abetted the act with the intention of causing that effect, provided he knew that the act abetted was likely to cause that effect.

Liability of abettor for an effect caused by the act abetted different from that intended by the abettor.

ILLUSTRATION.

A instigates B to cause grievous hurt to Z. B, in consequence of the instigation causes grievous hurt to Z. Z dies in consequence. Here, if A knew that the grievous hurt abetted was likely to cause death, A is liable to be punished with the punishment provided for murder.

COMMENT.

This section should be read in conjunction with s. 111. Section 111 provides for the doing of an act different from the one abetted, whereas this section deals with the case where the act done is the same as the act abetted but its effect is different. To make the abettor liable it must be shown that he knew that the act abetted was likely to cause that effect. This can be done by showing that a reasonable man would draw an inference that a particular effect was likely to ensue from a particular act.

Abetment to attempt to murder.—It is somewhat difficult to conceive circumstances which constitute instigation to another to make merely an attempt to murder. Prima facie any incitement to use violence to another would fall under one of the two categories, viz., to cause death, or to cause hurt, either grievous or simple.⁶

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—Same as that for the offence abetted.

114. Whenever any person, who if absent would be liable to be punished as an abettor,¹ is present when the act or offence for which he would be punishable in consequence of the abetment is committed,² he shall be deemed to have committed such act or offence.³

Abettor present when offence is committed.

COMMENT.

Principal.—The meaning of this section is that if the nature of the act done constitutes abetment, then, if present, the abettor is to be deemed to have committed the offence, though in point of fact another man actually committed it. The section says that the person present is deemed to have committed the offence, not that he has committed it. It simply provides for the punishment of what the English law calls 'principals in the second degree.' A person present abetting an offence is to be deemed to have committed the offence though he does not, in fact, do so any more than a 'principal in the second degree' does.⁷ Where, for instance, a blow is struck by A, in the presence of, and by the order of, B, both are principals in the transaction. If two persons join in beating a man, and he dies, it is not necessary to ascertain exactly what the effect of each blow was.⁸ If A instigates B to murder Z, he commits abetment; if absent, he is punishable as an abettor, and if the offence is committed, then under s. 109; if present, he is by this section deemed to have committed the offence and is punishable as a principal.

Scope.—This section "... is only brought into operation when circumstances amounting to abetment of a particular crime have first been proved, and then the presence of the accused at the commission of that crime is proved in addition ... Sec. 114 deals with the case, where there has been the crime of abetment, but where also there has been actual commission of the crime abetted and the abettor has been present thereat, and the way in which it deals with such a case is this. Instead of the crime being still abetment with circumstances of aggravation, the crime becomes the very crime abetted. The section is evidentiary not punitive. Because participation de facto (as this case shows) may sometimes be obscure in detail, it is established by the presumption juris et de jure that actual presence plus prior abetment can mean nothing else but participation. The presumption raised by s. 114 brings the case within the ambit of s. 34."⁹ Thus suppose A meets his death as the result of a blow struck by B. C is present, but it is not clear what, if any, act was done by him. If any previous act or omission by C is proved which would amount to abetment of the killing of A by B, the Court is bound to presume that C was a participant within the meaning of s. 34.

This section applies to those cases only in which not only is the abettor present at the time of the commission of the offence but the abetment has been completed prior to and independently of his presence. The real test to see whether or not this section is applicable lies in its words "who if absent would be liable to be punished as an abettor." These words clearly show that abetment to come under this section must be one which is prior to the commission of the offence and complete by itself and not an abetment which is done immediately before or at the time of the commission of the offence, for in the latter case the abettor would not have committed the abetment if he had not been present and would not therefore have been liable to punishment as an abettor.¹⁰ Further, it applies to those cases only in which the accused, if absent, would be liable to be punished as an abettor. But where the accused, if absent, could not have been liable as an abettor since there was no conspiracy between the accused and the co-accused, the section is not applicable.¹¹

In order to bring a person within this section, it is necessary first to make out the circumstances which constitute abetment, so that if absent, he would have been liable to be punished as an abettor, and then to show that he was also present when the offence was committed.¹² The abetment must have been completed before the actual offence is committed.¹³ The section is not applicable to a case where the abetment is at the time when the offence takes place and the abettor helps in the commission of the offence. In such a case the person is guilty of the offence itself and not merely of abetment except in cases like rape or bigamy where the person committing the offence alone can be guilty of it.¹⁴

Sections 34 and 114.—Under s. 34 if a criminal act is done by several persons, each is liable as if it were done by himself alone; so that if two or more persons are present aiding and abetting in the commission of a murder, each will be tried and convicted as a principal, though it might not be proved which of them actually committed the Act. The section refers to cases somewhat different, namely, where a person by abetment, previous to the commission of the act, renders himself liable as an abettor, is present when the act is committed, but takes no active part in the doing of it.¹⁵

The whole object of these two sections is to provide for cases in which the exact share of one of several criminals cannot be ascertained, though the moral culpability of each is clear and identical.¹⁶

Sections 109 and 114.—When a person is present and abets another to commit an offence, s. 114 is not applicable to the case. When a person who abets the commission of an offence is present and helps in the commission of the offence, he is guilty of the offence and not merely of abetment except in a few cases like rape or bigamy where the person committing the offence alone can be guilty of the offence. Section 114 applies to a case where a person abets the commission of an offence, some time before it takes place and happens to be present at the time when the offence is committed, and is not applicable to a case where the abetment is at the time when the offence takes place and the abettor helps in the commission. Active abetment at the time of committing the offence is covered by s. 109 and s. 114 is clearly intended for an abetment previous to the actual commission of the crime, any time, that is, before the first steps have been taken to commit it. A person was on his way home in the evening when he was waylaid by M and B along with J at whose instigation M and B inflicted certain injuries on that person. M and B were convicted under ss. 324 and 325 respectively and J was convicted under ss. 324 and 325 read with s. 114. It was held that in the circumstances of the case it might have been more correct to convict J under s. 109, but he on either view was liable to exactly the same punishment, and, therefore, the interests of justice did not require any interference on what can only be regarded as a technical ground. Prima facie, it would seem illogical that a man should be deemed to have committed an offence if he has abetted it beforehand but does nothing at the time when it is committed and on the other hand shall not be deemed to have committed that offence if at the time when it is committed he has just abetted it, is still present and is still abetting it.¹⁷

1. 'Who if absent would be liable to be punished as an abettor.'—To bring a person within this section the abetment must be complete apart from the mere presence of the abettor.¹⁸ It is necessary first to make out the circumstances which constitute abetment, so that, "if absent", he would have been "liable to be punished as an abettor", and then to show that he was present when the offence was committed.¹⁹ Previous concert is an essential factor in the constitution of the offence of abetment under this section. Where both master and servant were present and the latter received money for selling ganja in contravention of the terms of the license, it was held that having regard to the provisions of s. 34 the servant was liable for the illegal sale, but that this section would not apply "unless the person present abetting the offence would, if absent, have been guilty of abetment."²⁰

Where no conspiracy, instigation, or act, or illegal omission, is proved and the abetment consists only of participation in the actual commission of the offence, s. 109 is the section applicable.²¹

2. 'Is present when the act or offence is committed.'—Presence is either actual or constructive. It is not necessary that the party should be actually present, an ear or eye witness of the transaction; he is, in construction of law, present, aiding and abetting, if, with the intention of giving assistance, he be near enough to afford it, should occasion arise. Presence during the whole of the transaction is not necessary. For instance, if several persons combine to forge an instrument, and each executes by himself a distinct part of the forgery, and they are not together when the instrument is completed, they are nevertheless all guilty as principals.²² If a man is simply present whilst an offence is committed, but does not take any part in it he will not be liable merely because he takes no steps to prevent the offence.²³ The mere presence as an abettor of any person will not render him liable for the offence committed.²⁴ He must be sufficiently near to give assistance,²⁵ and there must be a participation in the act.¹ In a case under the Burma Gambling Act (Burma Act I of 1899) it was held that persons who are merely present at a set fight of birds or animals in a public place, and are mere spectators without participation or encouragement of any kind by gestures, expressions or actions, cannot be said to aid and abet the fight.²

The mere presence of a person on the occasion of giving a bribe and his omission to promptly inform the authorities, do not constitute him an accomplice, unless it can be shown that he somehow co-operated in the payment of the bribe, or was instrumental in the negotiations for the payment.³

The act at the doing of which the abettor is present must amount to an offence. Thus this section is not applicable to the case of a person abetting the pledging of a thing entrusted to a stranger.⁴

If an abettor of an offence is, on account of his presence at its commission, to be charged under this section as a principal, his abetment must continue down to the time of the commission of the offence. If he distinctly withdraws at any moment before the final act is done, the offence cannot be held to have been committed with his continuing abetment.⁵

A conviction under this section cannot stand where the abetment charged necessarily requires the presence of the abettor. To come within the section, the abetment must be complete apart from the presence of the abettor.⁶ One R was charged with having committed the murder of one B by being present and abetting one M in striking and thereby killing him. The allegation was that R gave orders to M to strike B who was thereupon hit on the head with a heavy stick. Two persons who were admittedly eye-witnesses to the occurrence were not called as witnesses by the prosecution. It was held that the conviction of R under s. 302 and this section could not stand as the only abetment charged necessarily required the presence of R, while to come within this section the abetment must be complete apart from the presence of the abettor.⁷

Cases.—Where the accused came with a number of armed men and forcibly carried off a crop without the consent of the owner, it was held that even if they took no part in the actual carrying off, they must be considered as principals.⁸

Where A urged B to attack C, and B stabbed with a knife, but there was no proof that B had the knife in his hand at the time of A's urging him on, or that A knew in any other way that B would be likely to use a knife. It was held that A could not be convicted of abetting an offence under s. 326, but only of abetting an assault.⁹

Persons who incite others to commit criminal trespass under s. 447 and are present when the trespass is committed, though they do not themselves commit it, are guilty of criminal trespass in virtue of the provisions of this section.¹⁰ One S was charged with having abetted the murder of one M by being present and instigating the other accused in striking and thereby killing him. It was held that the act of S amounted to an abetment of the offence of murder.¹¹

Person watching outside house while offence is being committed inside.—

Where a person watched the door of a house while a murder was being committed inside, he was held guilty of murder. A conspirator, who stood outside of a house, while his friends entered inside and looted it, and watched out in pursuance of the common design, was held guilty under this section.¹²

English cases.—A person waiting outside of a house to receive goods which a confederate was stealing in the house was held to be the 'principal' in the theft.¹³ Where several persons were acting together, some in the shop and some out, and the property was stolen by the hands of one of those who were in the shop, it was held that those who were outside were equally guilty as principals.¹⁴ J had employed M to load sacks of oats, the property of J, from a vessel on to the trams of K who was to carry them on the trams to the warehouse of J. By previous concert between M and K oats were taken by M from two of the sacks and put into a nose-bag in the absence of K, and hidden under a tram. K returned in a few minutes and took the nose-bag and its contents from under the tram and took them away, M being then within three or four yards of him. It was held that as both had been present at some parts of the transaction, both could be convicted as principals in the larceny.¹⁵ S was a barman at a refreshment bar, and C went up to the bar, called for refreshments and put down a florin. S served C, took up the florin, and took from his employers' till some money, and gave C as his change 18s. 6d., which C put in his pocket and went away with it. On leaving the place he took some silver from his pocket and was counting it when he was arrested. On entering the bar signs of recognition took place between S and C, and C was present when S took the money from the till. It was held that C was liable as a principal in the second degree.¹⁶

3. 'He shall be deemed to have committed such act or offence.'—These words are very important. Their effect is that the person present is to be treated in the same way as if he had committed the offence. This is not the same thing as saying 'he has committed the offence.' The person present is deemed to have committed the offence, not that he has committed it. It is upon this ground that the previous conviction of an accused for an offence cannot be taken into consideration at a subsequent conviction for abetment for the purpose of enhancing punishment under s. 75.¹⁷

When one thing is not the same as another thing, but the Legislature says that it "shall be deemed to be" the same thing, it creates a legal fiction, and in that case "the Court is entitled and bound to ascertain for what purposes and between what persons the statutory fiction is to be resorted to."¹⁸ And fictions created by law shall never be contradicted so as to defeat the ends for which they are invented, though for every other purpose they may be contradicted.¹⁹

A Full Bench of the Rangoon High Court has dissented from the Bombay view in *Kashia Antoo*²⁰ and held that a person, who is punishable under a particular section of the Code read with s. 114, is punishable not as an abettor but as a principal and is guilty of the substantive offence and not merely of abetment of that offence. Heald, J., said: "I cannot read that section (s. 114) otherwise than as meaning that such a person is more than an abettor and that he is in fact what is called in English law a principal in the second degree."²¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the committing of the principal offence.

(2) That the accused was present whilst it was being committed.

(3) That the accused was an abettor of the offence (s. 108).

It is necessary to prove acts which would constitute abetment if the accused was absent and then to show that the accused was present.

This section is evidentiary and not punitive because it establishes a presumption which is irrebutable that actual presence plus prior abetment can mean nothing else but participation.²²

Procedure.—Same as that for the offence abetted.

In a case covered by this section it is not enough to frame a charge as for the substantive offence without specifying the special circumstances which bring the case within its purview.²³

Abetment of offence punishable with death or transportation for life—if offence not committed;

115. Whoever abets the commission of an offence¹ punishable with death or transportation for life, shall, if that offence be not committed in consequence of the abetment, and no express provision² is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment,³ be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if any act for which the abettor is liable in consequence of the abetment, and which causes hurt⁴ to any person, is done, the abettor shall be liable to imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to fourteen years, and shall also be liable to fine.

ILLUSTRATION.

A instigates B to murder Z. The offence is not committed. If B had murdered Z, he would have been subject to the punishment of death or transportation for life. Therefore A is liable to imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years and also to a fine; and, if any hurt be done to Z in consequence of the abetment, he will be liable to imprisonment for a term which may extend to fourteen years, and to fine.

COMMENT.

This section punishes the abetment of certain offences which are either not committed at all, or not committed in consequence of abetment, or only in part committed. Abetment under this section need not necessarily be abetment of the commission of an offence by a particular person against a particular person.²⁴

Offences punishable with death only—see s. 303.

Offences punishable with death or transportation for life—see ss. 121, 132, 194, 302, 303, 305, 307 and 396.

Offences punishable with transportation for life—see ss. 121A, 122, 124A, 125, 128, 130, 131, 194, 222, 225, 226, 232, 238, 255, 304, 307, 311, 313, 314, 326, 329, 364, 371, 376, 377, 388, 389, 394, 400, 409, 412, 413, 436, 438, 449, 459, 467, 472, 474 and 477.

Three different states of fact may arise after an abetment :—

(1) No offence may be committed. In this case the offender is punishable under this section and s. 116 for the mere attempt to commit a crime.

(2) The very act at which the abetment aims may be committed, and will be punishable under ss. 109 and 110.

(3) Some act different, but naturally flowing from the act abetted, may be perpetrated, in which case the instigator will fall under the penalties of ss. 111, 112 and 113.

1. 'Offence.'—This term here denotes a thing punishable under the Code or any special or local law (s. 40).

2. 'Express provision.'—This refers to sections in which specific cases of abetment of offences punishable with death or transportation for life are dealt with.²⁵

3. 'Such abetment.'—These words refer to the abetment of the offences specified in the section itself, namely an offence punishable with death or transportation for life, and only ss. 121 and 131 provide for the punishment of the abetment of such offences.¹

4. 'Hurt.'—See s. 319, infra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove that the offence abetted, though not committed in consequence, is one punishable with death, or transportation for life.

Procedure.—Not bailable; and see the offence abetted.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, abetted the commission by one XY of an offence of——punishable with death or transportation for life, which said offence was not committed in consequence of the abetment, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 115 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

116. Whoever abets an offence¹ punishable with imprisonment shall, if that offence be not committed in consequence of the abetment, and no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment, be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for that offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term provided for that offence; or with such fine as is provided for that offence, or with both;

and if the abettor or the person abetted is a public servant,² whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence, the abettor shall be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for that offence, for a term which may extend to one-half of the longest term provided for that offence, or with such fine as is provided for the offence; or with both.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A offers a bribe to B, a public servant, as a reward for showing A some favour in the exercise of B's official functions. B refuses to accept the bribe. A is punishable under this section.

(b) A instigates B to give false evidence. Here, if B does not give false evidence, A has nevertheless committed the offence defined in this section, and is punishable accordingly.

(c) A, a police-officer, whose duty it is to prevent robbery, abets the commission of robbery. Here, though the robbery be not committed, A is liable to one-half of the longest term of imprisonment provided for that offence, and also to fine.

(d) B abets the commission of a robbery by A, a police-officer, whose duty it is to prevent that offence. Here though the robbery be not committed, B is liable to one-half of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence of robbery, and also to fine.

COMMENT.

This section provides for the abetment of an offence punishable with imprisonment. There is no corresponding provision in the Code for punishing abetment of an offence punishable with fine only, e.g., offences under ss. 137, 154, 156, 278, 283, 290 and 294A (second para.)

1. 'Offence.'—This term here means a thing punishable under the Code or some local or special law (s. 40).

2. 'Public servant.'—Sec s. 21, supra.

The enhanced punishment provided in the second clause of this section only applies to those public servants whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence. Public servants not falling in this category will be dealt with under the first clause. Where the accused was charged with having abetted the commission of an offence punishable under s. 161 of the Penal Code, the person abetted having been a Civil Surgeon, it was held that the enhanced imprisonment prescribed by the latter part of this section could not be awarded, as the Civil Surgeon was not a public servant within the words of the section, 'whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence.'²

Illustration (a).—This illustration is only an example of abetment of an offence under s. 161. It makes an abortive attempt at giving a bribe an offence from the point of view of the person who offers it. There are many other ways of instigating a public servant to commit an offence under s. 161 besides by means of a direct offer of a bribe.³ Where a doctor in charge of a Government hospital was offered a bribe to retain a patient in the hospital for a period longer than it was necessary, and the doctor refused the bribe, it was held that the person offering the bribe was guilty under s. 161 and this illustration.⁴ letter, which was one of several printed forms prepared for circulation to Vakils practising in districts, was to the effect that the Vakil, to whom it was addressed, "could easily send his clients' cases, both civil and criminal", to the writer, who would conduct them in that Court. And 'as a remuneration' the fees paid by the clients would be shared between the writer and the Vakil who had sent the cases. It was held that that was incitement within the meaning of this section.⁵

The accused who had got a warrant of attachment of certain land issued against a judgment-debtor wanted to have the warrant signed by the Revenue Assistant. He wished to bribe the Reader of the Revenue Assistant in order to get this done. While he was standing outside the Court-room of the Revenue Assistant he saw a person coming out of the Court-room and thinking that he was the Reader of the Revenue Assistant, placed Rs. 2 and the warrant in his hand, and asked him to get the warrant signed and take the money. The person accosted was not the Reader but was a Magistrate. It was held that the accused did request the Magistrate, in his capacity as a public servant, to render him the service of getting the warrant signed by another public servant, and, therefore, although the Magistrate did not render him the service required, yet the act would still be punishable as 'abetment' of the offence under s. 161 read with this section.⁶

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove that the offence abetted, though not committed in consequence, is one punishable with imprisonment, or that the accused, or the person abetted, is a public servant; and that it was his duty to prevent the commission of such offence.

Procedure.—Same as that for the offence abetted.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, abetted the commission by one XY of an offence of——punishable with imprisonment, which said offence was not committed in consequence of the abetment, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 116 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

117. Whoever abets the commission of an offence¹ by the public²

Abetting—commission of offence by the public or by more than ten persons.

generally or by any number or class of persons exceeding ten,³ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

ILLUSTRATION.

A affixes in a public place a placard instigating a sect consisting of more than ten members to meet at a certain time and place, for the purpose of attacking the members of an adverse sect, while engaged in a procession. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

COMMENT.

This section covers all offences and is a general provision for abetment by any number of persons exceeding ten. When more than ten persons are instigated to commit an offence punishable with death, the offence clearly comes under s. 115 as well as this section.⁷ The view of the Lahore High Court that s. 115 applies only when the abetment is not punishable under another provision of the Code and that where s. 117 is applicable, the offence will not fall under s. 115 is not sound.⁸ Section 117 is not an express provision for abetment of an offence punishable with death or transportation.⁹

Under this section it will be sufficient to show any instigation or other mode of abetment, though neither the effect intended nor any effect follows from it. This section stood as clause 94 in the draft Code and contained another illustration as follows :—

“A inserts in a newspaper an article advising soldiers to shoot every commanding officer who uses them harshly. A has committed the offence defined in this clause.”

Sections 115 and 117.—Abetment has a reference both to the person or persons abetted, and to the offence or offences the commission of which is abetted. Section 117 deals with the former whatever be the nature of the offence abetted, while s. 115 deals with the latter, without having regard to the person or persons abetted. Abetment of the commission of murder, whether by a single individual or by a class of persons exceeding ten, falls under s. 115. In the latter case it may fall under s. 117 also, but as s. 117 prescribes a lesser punishment, s. 115 is the more appropriate provision for such an offence. Although both the sections are applicable, there cannot be separate sentences under the two sections for the same criminal act, and the conviction should properly be under that section which inflicts the higher punishment.¹⁰

1. ‘Abets the commission of an offence.’—Mere presiding at a meeting at which songs, criminally offensive, are sung in his presence, does not make the president liable for abetment, in the absence of evidence that he positively encouraged the singer or persuaded him to sing the particular songs or was a party to an agreement for singing them or specifically accorded permission to the singer to sing them.¹¹ The term ‘offence’ here denotes a thing punishable under the Code or some local or special law (s. 40).

2. ‘Public.’—This word includes any class of the public or any community (s. 12, supra). In order that there may be abetment, by means of a leaflet, of the commission of an offence by the public, it is necessary that the public should have read the leaflet or that it should have been exposed to the public gaze at a time when it was possible for the public to read the same. Consequently, when a leaflet inciting the public to commit offences is affixed at a public place at dead of night, but is removed by the police shortly afterwards before the public could see or read it, there is no offence under this section, even if some of the policemen removing the leaflet read it, it being impossible to class them as the public.¹²

3. ‘Any number or class of persons exceeding ten.’—The offence abetted must have been intended to be committed by the public or by any number of persons exceeding ten collectively and conjointly.¹³ Where, therefore, a person abetted twelve coolies to break their contracts, it was held that as each breach of contract was a separate and distinct offence, the abettor abetted twelve offences by twelve persons, and not one offence by twelve persons, and so was not punishable under this section.¹⁴ Where the accused instigated people to become members of a Jatha which would be unlawful association within the meaning of s. 16 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, it was held that his act came within the purview of this section.¹⁵ Where the accused instigated railway workers, in the event of a strike, to lie on the railway line, it was held that this section was applicable.¹⁶ A speech by which the speaker was trying to foment a strike, when no strike had yet been started and was attempting to incite the prospective strikers against what are commonly known as black-legs, was held to fall under this section.¹⁷

The Bombay High Court has held that this section applies to the abetment of an offence which is punishable under s. 47 of the Bombay Salt Act (II of 1890), and which is committed by the public generally or any number or class of persons exceeding ten.¹⁸ The Chief Court of Oudh has taken a contrary view. It has held that s. 9 of the Indian Salt Act (XII of 1882) embraces all abetments whether aggravated or mitigated in their nature. The section does not provide for any exception in respect of such abetments as are provided for by this section and the punishment prescribed by s. 9 is clearly punishment which is prescribed for all abetments of acts which are declared to be offences under the Indian Salt Act. It is illegal to proceed under this section which allows a higher punishment for abetment of an offence for the punishment of which a lighter and separate penalty is provided by s. 9.¹⁹ The Allahabad and the Madras High Courts have taken the same view as the Bombay High Court. The Allahabad High Court has held that a person guilty of abetment of an offence under s. 9(a) of the Indian Salt Act may be convicted under this section if the abetment was of the commission of the offence by the public generally or by any number or class of persons exceeding ten.²⁰ The Madras High Court has held that an accused person who is guilty of having instigated more than ten persons to commit an offence under s. 74 of the Madras Salt Act (IV of 1889) is liable under this section. The gravamen of a charge under this section is the abetment itself, the instigation to general lawlessness, not the particular offence of which the commission is instigated. Section 74 of the Madras Salt Act refers to the direct abetment of particular acts and does not embrace the offence under this section.²¹

CASE.

Mere presiding at a meeting at which songs, criminally offensive, were sung in the presence of the president, was held not to make the president liable for abetment, in the absence of evidence that he positively encouraged the singer or persuaded him to sing the particular songs or was a party to an agreement for singing them or specifically accorded permission to the singer to sing them.²²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) abetment of the offence in question by the accused.

(2) That such offence was to be committed by the public; or by more than ten persons.

Procedure.—Same as that for the offence abetted. An offence under this section read with s. 17(1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act can be tried as a summons case, if the sentence imposed does not exceed imprisonment for six months.²³

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, abetted the commission of an offence of——by——numbering more than ten persons, by (state the act done by the accused in instigation), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 117 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

shall, if that offence be committed, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or, if the offence be not committed, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years; and in either case shall also be liable to fine.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, knowing that dacoity is about to be committed at B, falsely informs the Magistrate that a dacoity is about to be committed at C, a place in an opposite direction, and thereby misleads the Magistrate with intent to facilitate the commission of the offence. The dacoity is committed at B in pursuance of the design. A is punishable under this section.

COMMENT.

Under s. 107 concealment of a design to commit an offence constitutes an abetment. There must be an obligation on the person concealing the offence to disclose it. The concealment to be criminal must be intentional or at least with knowledge that it will facilitate the commission of an offence.

This section and ss. 119 and 120, all contemplate the concealment of a design by persons other than the accused to commit the offence charged.²⁴ These sections apply to the concealment of all offences except those which are merely punishable with fine. They deal with concealment prior to the commission of an offence. Sections 202 and 203 deal with subsequent concealment.

1. 'Offence'.—See ss. 43 and 33, supra. 2. 'Voluntarily'.—See s. 39, supra.

3. 'Conceals'.—A person cannot be punished if he is not legally bound to inform of the existence of a design and where he has not concealed the existence of the design by any overt act.²⁵ By s. 44 of the Criminal Procedure Code¹ every person, whether within or without the presidency-towns, aware of the commission of, or of the intention of any other person to commit any offence punishable under sections 121, 126, 130, 143-145, 147, 148, 302-304, 382, 392-399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 456-460 of the Indian Penal Code shall, in the absence of reasonable excuse, the burden of proving which shall lie upon the person so aware, forthwith give information to the nearest Magistrate or police-officer of such commission or intention.

4. 'Illegal omission'.—See s. 43, supra. It must be shown that the omission was likely to facilitate the commission of an offence.² Concealment by illegal omission can be an offence only when the omission is by some person bound by law to make report of offences.

5. 'The existence of a design'.—There must exist a design to commit at some future time an offence of the kind described, and no conviction should take place until the Court has sufficient proof that such a design existed.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the existence of the design to commit an offence.

(2) That such offence was one punishable with death, or transportation for life.

(3) That the accused concealed the existence of such design (a) by his act or illegal omission; or (b) by his knowingly false representation.

(4) That he did so voluntarily.

(5) That he thereby intended to facilitate or knew that he would thereby facilitate, the commission of such offence.

(6) That the offence concealed has been committed (if the case falls under the first clause).

Procedure.—Not bailable, if the concealment is of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life and the offence is committed. Bailable, if the offence is not committed.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——with the intention of facilitating, or with the knowledge that you will thereby facilitate the commission of the offence of——(specify the act) (or omit to do——specify the omission) to conceal the existence of the design to commit the said offence, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 118 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

119. Whoever, being a public servant¹ intending to facilitate or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby facilitate the commission of an offence² which it is his duty as such public servant to prevent—

Public servant concealing design to commit offence which it is his duty to prevent—voluntarily conceals, by any act or illegal omission, the existence of a design to commit such offence, or makes any representation which he knows to be false respecting such design, shall, if the offence be committed, be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-half of the longest term of such imprisonment, or with such fine as is provided for that offence, or with both ;

if offence be committed ;
or, if the offence be punishable with death or transportation for life, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years ; or, if the offence be not committed, shall be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of such imprisonment or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, an officer of police, being legally bound to give information of all designs to commit robbery which may come to his knowledge, and knowing that B designs to commit robbery, omits to give such information, with intent to facilitate the commission of that offence. Here A has by an illegal omission concealed the existence of B's design, and is liable to punishment according to the provision of this section.

COMMENT.

Section 118 deals with persons who are not public servants. In this section the same principle is extended to public servants but with severe penalty. Every omission on the part of a public servant to disclose a design to commit an offence which it is his duty to prevent will be punishable under this section.

1. 'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra. The section only applies to that class of public servants whose duty it is to prevent such offence.

2. 'Offence.'—See s. 40, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the existence of the design to commit an offence.

(2) That the accused was a public servant.

(3) That it was the duty of the accused, as such public servant, to prevent the commission of that offence.

(4) That the accused concealed the existence of such design (a) by his act or illegal omission; or (b) by his knowingly false representation.

(5) That the accused did so voluntarily.

(6) That the accused thereby intended to facilitate, or knew that he would thereby facilitate, the commission of such offence.

(7) That the offence concealed has been committed (if the case falls under the first clause).

Procedure.—Not bailable, if the concealment is of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life. Otherwise, the procedure is the same as that for the offence abetted.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, being a public servant, to wit—, whose duty it was to prevent the commission of the offence of—, with the intention of facilitating, or with the knowledge that you will thereby facilitate, the commission of the offence of—did (specify the act) (or omit to do—specify the omission) to conceal the existence of the design to commit the said offence, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 119 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

Concealing design to commit offence punishable with imprisonment—

120. Whoever, intending to facilitate or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby facilitate the commission of an offence¹ punishable with imprisonment, voluntarily conceals, by any act or illegal omission, the existence of a design to commit such offence, or makes any representation which he knows to be false respecting such design, shall, if the offence be committed; if offence be not committed, be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-fourth, and, if the offence be not committed, to one-eighth, of the longest term of such imprisonment, or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.

COMMENT.

Section 118 deals with offences punishable with death or transportation for life : this section deals with offences punishable with imprisonment. The basic principle in both the sections is one and the same. All offences except those punishable with fine are included in these two sections.

The illegal concealment by act or omission contemplated by this section has reference to the existence of a design on the part of third persons to commit an offence.³

1. 'Offence.'—Sec s. 40, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the existence of the design to commit an offence.

CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY.

Definition of criminal conspiracy. 120A. When two or more persons agree¹ to do, or cause to be done,—

(1) an illegal act,² or

(2) an act which is not illegal by illegal means,³ such an agreement is designated a criminal conspiracy:

Provided that no agreement except an agreement to commit an offence shall amount to a criminal conspiracy unless some act besides the agreement is done by one or more parties to such agreement⁴ in pursuance thereof.

Explanation.—It is immaterial whether the illegal act is the ultimate object of such agreement, or is merely incidental to that object.

COMMENT.

This Chapter has introduced into the criminal law of India a new offence, namely, the offence of criminal conspiracy. It was introduced by the Criminal Law Amendment Act.¹ Conspiracy is a substantive offence and has nothing to do with abetment. This section provides an extended definition of criminal conspiracy covering acts which do not amount to abetment by conspiracy within the meaning of s. 107. Where a criminal conspiracy amounts to an abetment under s. 107, it is unnecessary to invoke the provisions of this section or s. 120B, because the Code has made specific provision for the punishment of such a conspiracy.²

Conspiracy differs from other offences in this respect, that in other offences the intention to do a criminal act is not a crime of itself until something is done amounting to the doing or the attempting to do some act to carry out the intention; conspiracy, on the other hand, consists simply in the agreement or confederacy to do some act, no matter whether it is done or not.³

There is not much substantial difference between conspiracy, as defined in this section, and acting on a common intention as contemplated in s. 34. While in the former, the gist of the offence is bare engagement and association to break the law even though the illegal act does not follow, the gist of the offence under s. 34 is the commission of a criminal act in furtherance of a common intention of all the offenders, which means that there should be unity of criminal behaviour resulting in something, for which an individual would be punishable, if it were all done by himself alone.⁴

Object.—The Statement of Objects and Reasons stated :—“The sections of the Indian Penal Code which deal directly with the subject of conspiracy are those contained in Chapter V and s. 121A of that Code. Under the latter provision it is an offence to conspire to commit any of the offences punishable by s. 121 of the Indian Penal Code or to conspire to deprive the King of the sovereignty of British India or of any part thereof, or to overawe, by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force, the Government of India or any Local Government, and to constitute a conspiracy under this section it is not necessary that any act or illegal omission should take place in pursuance thereof. Under s. 107 abetment includes the engaging with one or more person or persons in any conspiracy for the doing of a thing, if an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy, and in order to the doing of that thing. In other words, except in respect of the offences particularized in s. 121A, conspiracy per se is not an offence under the Indian Penal Code.

"On the other hand, by the common law of England if two or more persons agree together to do anything contrary to law, or to use unlawful means in the carrying out of an object not otherwise unlawful, the persons, who so agree, commit the offence of conspiracy. In other words, conspiracy in England may be defined as an agreement of two or more persons to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means, and the parties to such a conspiracy are liable to indictment.

"Experience has shown that dangerous conspiracies are entered into in India which have for their object aims other than the commission of the offences specified in s. 121A of the Indian Penal Code, and that the existing law is inadequate to deal with modern conditions. The present Bill is designed to assimilate the provisions of the Indian Penal Code to those of the English law with the additional safeguard that in the case of a conspiracy other than a conspiracy to commit an offence some overt act is necessary to bring the conspiracy within the purview of the criminal law. The Bill makes criminal conspiracy a substantive offence, and when such a conspiracy is to commit an offence punishable with death, transportation or rigorous imprisonment for a term of two years or upwards, and no express provision is made in the Code, provides a punishment of the same nature as that which might be awarded for the abetment of such an offence. In all other cases of criminal conspiracy the punishment contemplated is imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding six months or with fine or with both."⁵

Scope.—The section is not applicable to offences committed before it came into force.⁶

Ingredients.—The ingredients of this offence are :—

(1) That there should be an agreement between the persons who are alleged to conspire; and

(2) That the agreement should be—

(i) for doing of an illegal act, or

(ii) for doing by illegal means an act which may not itself be illegal.⁷

To constitute a criminal conspiracy there must be an agreement of two or more persons, to do an act which is illegal or which is to be done by illegal means. The object in view or the methods employed should be illegal, as defined in s. 43, supra. A distinction is drawn between an agreement to commit an offence, and an agreement of which either the object or the methods employed are illegal but do not constitute an offence. In the case of the former, the criminal conspiracy is completed by the act of agreement; in the case of the latter, there must be some act done by one or more of the parties to the agreement to effect the object thereof, that is, there must be an overt act.

A mere agreement between two or more persons to do an illegal act, or an act which is not illegal by illegal means, is of itself a criminal conspiracy. It is one thing to say that a mere agreement constitutes a conspiracy in certain circumstances, but it is entirely another thing to say that an agreement having been made it is impossible that the conspiracy should exist beyond the actual moment of time at which the agreement is born. It is true that a mere agreement may bring the conspiracy into existence but nowhere is it said in the Code that after that the offence no longer exists. Criminal conspiracy may come into existence, and may persist and will persist so long as the persons constituting the conspiracy remain in agreement and so long as they are acting in accord, in furtherance of the objects for which they entered into the agreement.⁸

1. 'Agree.'—The gist of the offence of conspiracy is the bare engagement and association to break the law, whether any act be done in pursuance thereof by the conspirators or not.⁹ A person may be guilty of criminal conspiracy even though the illegal act, which he has agreed to do, has not been done, for the crime of conspiracy consists only in the agreement or confederacy to do an illegal act by legal means or a legal act by illegal means.¹⁰ A conspiracy consists not merely in the intention of two or more, but in the agreement of two or more, to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. So long as such a design rests in intention only it is not indictable. When two or more agree to carry it into effect, the very plot is an act in itself, and the act of each of the parties, promise against promise, actus contra actum, becomes capable of being enforced if lawful, punishable if for a criminal object or for the use of criminal means.¹¹ When one of the two accused is acquitted of the charge under ss. 120B and 302, the other cannot be convicted of the charge.¹² Where the conspiracy alleged in the charge is one in which only three persons are said to have been participants and two of them are acquitted, the other is entitled to an acquittal as a matter of course.¹³

2. 'Illegal act.'—The word "illegal" is defined in s. 43. It is not necessary that the agreement of conspiracy should be limited to the commission of only a single act and that it could not comprise the commission of many acts within its scope.¹⁴

Where a person was aware of the fact that a large amount of jewellery had been handed over by a lady to another person in order that he might deposit it for safe custody in a bank and of the fact that that person had pawned that jewellery and kept the proceeds, but not only did the person, who was aware, not inform the lady whose property had been misappropriated of the fact, although he was married to her granddaughter but he told her deliberate untruths upon the subject, it was held that both those men were engaged in a criminal conspiracy.¹⁵

3. 'Illegal means.'—An agreement to effect something which in itself may be indifferent or even lawful by unlawful means amounts to conspiracy.¹⁶ A woman who, believing herself to be with child, but not being with child, conspires with other persons to administer drugs to herself, or to use instruments on herself, with intent to procure abortion, is liable to be convicted of conspiracy to procure abortion.¹⁷

4. 'Unless some act besides the agreement is done by one or more parties to such agreement.'—When the agreement is not for commission of an offence an overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy is necessary. The law does not take notice of the intention or the state of mind of the offender and there must be some overt act to give expression to the intention. The overt act in a case of conspiracy consists in the agreement of the parties to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means.¹⁸ Mere study of communist literature and profession of communist doctrine not being contrary to law are not punishable per se in the absence of any overt act.¹⁹

120B. (1) Whoever is a party to a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable with death, transportation or rigorous imprisonment for a term of two years or upwards, shall, where no express provision is made in this Code for the punishment of such a conspiracy,¹ be punished in the same manner as if he had abetted such offence.

(2) Whoever is a party to a criminal conspiracy other than a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable as aforesaid shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding six months, or with fine or with both.

COMMENT.

An offence under this section consists in the conspiracy without any reference to the subject-matter of the conspiracy and it is not necessary to establish the offence that there must have been definite property about which the parties are negotiating or which they have conspired to possess.²⁰

The punishment for a criminal conspiracy is more severe if the agreement is one to commit a serious offence; it is less severe if the agreement is to commit an act which, although illegal, is not an offence punishable with death, transportation, or rigorous imprisonment for more than two years.

Sub-section (2) does not apply to trade unions (vide s. 17 of the Indian Trade Unions Act, XVI of 1926).

Scope.—This section only applies where no offence has been actually committed.²¹

1. 'Where no express provision is made in this Code for the punishment of such a conspiracy'.—This section provides a punishment for criminal conspiracy where no express provision is made in the Code for the punishment of such a conspiracy. Where, therefore, a criminal conspiracy amounts to an abetment under s. 107, it is unnecessary to invoke the provisions of ss. 120A and 120B, because the Code has made specific provisions for the punishment of such a conspiracy.²² The Chief Court of Sind has laid down that where an offence is committed in conspiracy, it is optional for the prosecution to proceed either under s. 107 for abetment of the offence of conspiracy, or under s. 120B for the conspiracy as a substantive offence. The words "where no express provision has been made in this Code for the punishment of such a conspiracy" in this section, do not mean that when there is proof of an abetment of an offence, the charge should be for such an abetment. They only include cases where there is express provision for the punishment of the particular conspiracy alleged and the only such case in the Penal Code is under s. 121A.²³

An agreement to commit murder being an agreement to commit an offence falls within this section, and none the less so because the means by which the murder is to be perpetrated are not agreed upon, or the means which are agreed upon are such as are not likely to prove, and do not in fact prove, effective. If once there is a conspiracy to commit murder, the case falls within the section, the offence under it being the conspiracy and not the acts by which the subject-matter of the conspiracy is to be carried into effect. But if the conspiracy is merely to do an act which is not illegal, though in the hope and belief that that act may result in the death of or injury to some person, that does not amount to a conspiracy to do an illegal act. Hence where there is an agreement between the accused to perform witch-craft ceremony, the mere fact that the accused or some of them may have anticipated that the death of the intended victim will ensue will not constitute an offence under this section. But where the real agreement is to cause the death of the victim, the means to be tried in the first instance being a form of witch-craft, the nature of which none of the accused understands when they enter into the conspiracy, there is a conspiracy to murder punishable under this section.²⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused agreed to do or caused to be done an act.
(2) That such act was illegal or was done by illegal means.

Where the act itself is not illegal prove further

(3) That some overt act was done by one of the accused in pursuance of the agreement.

The gist of the offence is the agreement itself, and where the object of the agreement is to do an unlawful act, and not to do a lawful act by unlawful means, it is sufficient to specify the unlawful object without specifying the means adopted by all or any of the conspirators to gain that object.²⁵ Mere evidence of association is not sufficient to lead to an inference of conspiracy.¹ It is not necessary that there should be express proof of conspiracy. From the acts and conduct an agreement can be inferred. If it is proved that the accused pursued by the acts the same object, often by the same means, one performing one part of the act and the other another part of the same act, so as to complete it with a view to the attainment of the object which they were pursuing, the Court is at liberty to draw the inference that they conspired together to effect that object.²

To establish a charge of criminal conspiracy, the prosecution must prove an agreement between two or more persons to do or cause to be done some illegal act or some act which is not illegal by illegal means, provided that where the agreement is other than one to commit an offence, the prosecution must go further and prove that some act besides the agreement was done by one or more of the parties in pursuance of it. But where the agreement is one to do or cause to be done an act which is itself an offence, no overt act, i.e., any act done by one of the parties to the agreement in pursuance of it, need be proved; the crime of criminal conspiracy is established once such an agreement is proved. Hence where the conspiracy alleged is one to commit a series of serious crimes mere proof of such an agreement between the accused is sufficient to sustain a conviction. Proof of overt acts committed by the accused or any one of them is not strictly necessary on this charge, but needless to say, proof that they or some of them were concerned in the overt acts alleged would go far to establish that the agreement alleged was in fact made between them. Though proof of overt acts is not necessary in a case, yet it may well be that if such acts are proved, the Court will be bound to infer that they are not unconnected and isolated acts, but acts which must have been committed in pursuance of an agreement made between the accused.³

On a charge of conspiracy general evidence of the existence of the conspiracy may first be given, before particular facts are proved to show that one or more of the accused took part in it. Before evidence is let in under s. 10 of the Evidence Act, the defence is entitled to insist upon proof of reasonable ground for belief that the persons named in the charge have conspired together.⁴ Though general evidence of the existence of the conspiracy may first be given before particular facts are proved to show that one or more of the accused took part in it, it does not mean that conspiracy cannot be proved by circumstantial evidence only and that general evidence must be given.⁵ In cases of conspiracy direct evidence will be seldom forthcoming and it is necessary to look at the circumstances to see whether the conspiracy actually existed.⁶ A cipher code of revolutionary significance is good evidence that the persons named therein have conspired to commit an offence. Such a cipher code is substantive evidence of conspiracy.⁷

It is not sufficient, in order to convict a person under this section, to merely prove that he had been associating with the other accused at a certain place and on his arrest endeavoured to extricate himself from being accused of some thing connected with the conspiracy; and the prosecution cannot complete what is necessary in order to show that he was a person who concerted with others by proving that he was friendly with the other accused and was anxious to escape observation or even was doing his best to conceal his whereabouts.⁸

In cases of conspiracy, the agreement between the conspirators cannot generally be directly proved, but only inferred from the established facts in the case.⁹ A conspiracy need not be established by evidence of an actual agreement between the conspirators and overt acts raise a presumption of an agreement and knowledge of the purpose of the conspiracy. The connection has to be established with the conspiracy and not with the separate acts of different conspirators which are the overt acts of the different individuals in proof of the conspiracy.¹⁰ Overt acts may properly be looked at as evidence of the existence of a concerted intention and in many cases it is only by means of overt acts that the existence of the conspiracy can be made out. But the criminality of the conspiracy is independent of the criminality of the overt act.¹¹ To prove conspiracy it is not necessary that there should be direct communication between each conspirer and every other, but the criminal design alleged must be common to all.¹²

Where two persons took a house in which a considerable number of pieces of fire-arms was found with tools and implements, and work had been actually done to some of the parts of fire-arms, it was held that the Court may and ought to infer a conspiracy to manufacture arms.¹³

Where the proof of a conspiracy depends upon proof of the participation of the accused in an overt act which itself amounts to an offence, the proper course is to put the accused on their trial for that offence.¹⁴ Mere participation in one dacoity is not sufficient to prove the charge of conspiracy under this section, and, therefore, proof of one offence of dacoity or robbery is not sufficient to support a charge of conspiring to commit robberies and dacoities.¹⁵

The testimony of persons who have been members of a criminal conspiracy or else have joined it for the purpose of betraying its secrets must be very carefully scrutinised and much weight cannot be attached to it unless it is corroborated by other circumstances.¹⁶

The words and acts of any member of the conspiracy in reference to the common intention are relevant to determine the exact scope and details of the intention of any member or of all members of the conspiracy. Corroboration of the nature of the programme which was agreed upon by the strike committee can be obtained from the speeches and acts of any person present at the meetings of the committee and of the strikers.¹⁷

A conspiracy is generally a matter of inference deduced from certain criminal acts of the parties accused, done in pursuance of an apparent criminal purpose in common between them. In a case of conspiracy when there is no direct evidence, inferences from proved circumstances must to a large extent form the basis of the Court's conclusions, but in dealing with such cases based on circumstantial evidence an inference of guilt may be drawn only when the circumstances are such as to be incapable of any other reasonable interpretation. Where there are circumstances which are inconsistent with the charge of conspiracy, the charge should fail.¹⁸

The offence of conspiracy is one which requires detailed and specific proof against each of the accused that he individually participated in a particular design to do a particular criminal thing.¹⁹

Procedure.—If the offence falls under clause (1)—Cognizable, if the offence which is the object of the conspiracy is cognizable, but not otherwise—Warrant or summons, as the offence for which conspiracy is entered into—Bailable, if the offence which is the object of the conspiracy is bailable, otherwise not—Not compoundable—Court of Session, if the offence which is the object of the conspiracy is triable exclusively by such Court; in the case of all other offences, Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

If the offence falls under clause (2)—Warrant—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

When several persons conspire to commit offences, and commit overt acts in pursuance of the conspiracy (a circumstance which makes the act of one the act of each and all the conspirators), these acts are committed in the course of the same transaction, which embraces the conspiracy and the acts under it. The common concert and agreement which constitute the conspiracy serve to unify the acts done under it.²⁰ In cases of indictment for conspiracy, when two persons are indicted and are tried together either both must be convicted or both must be acquitted. Where, therefore, three persons were charged with having entered into a conspiracy, and two of them were acquitted, the third person could not be convicted of conspiracy, whether the conviction be upon the verdict of a jury or upon his own confession.²¹

Where several persons are charged with conspiracy the prosecution must prove that there is one conspiracy involving all the accused with a unity of will and purpose amongst them all and not a number of unrelated conspiracies entered into by different groups of the accused. If a number of unrelated conspiracies only is proved, the trial will be bad for misjoinder of parties under s. 239, Criminal Procedure Code.²²

In a charge of conspiracy, the object of the conspiracy must be proved as laid. Where a particular conspiracy is charged in the indictment, a different conspiracy cannot be found. Where the object of the conspiracy as charged is to commit murder, it is not open to the prosecution to prove a conspiracy the object of which is to commit a minor offence, namely grievous hurt.²³

Once a charge of conspiracy is framed, anything done in pursuance of the conspiracy can be tried at the trial for conspiracy. It is not an irregularity or an improper exercise of discretion in putting in the form of charges specific acts specially relied on as against each individual accused to show that they joined in the conspiracy. Where the accused is charged with an offence of conspiracy and acts of cheating in pursuance of conspiracy, the charge is not bad and it is open to the prosecution to prove such acts in order that from them the existence of the conspiracy may be proved.²⁴

When conspiracy is charged, it is always open to the prosecution to charge further that the illegal acts which were the object of the conspiracy have been carried out.²⁵

Where the matter has gone beyond the stage of mere conspiracy and offences are alleged to have been actually committed in pursuance thereof, s. 120A and this section are wholly irrelevant. Where the offence is alleged to have been committed by more than two persons, such of them as actually took part in the commission should be charged with the substantive offence, while those who are alleged to have abetted it by conspiracy should be charged with the offence of abetment under s. 109.¹

When in pursuance of a conspiracy an offence is committed, when the criminal purpose and object of a conspiracy has been carried out, it is idle to contend that it is not sufficient that the persons concerned be proceeded against for the crime itself and abetment thereof, but that they must necessarily be charged also with conspiracy. The prosecution are not bound to frame a charge of conspiracy under this section so as to attract the provisions of s. 196A of the Criminal Procedure Code.²

Joint trial.—All the accused against whom the prosecution alleges that there was unity of criminal behaviour actuated by a common intention to extort a confession can be jointly tried under s. 239 of the Criminal Procedure Code.³

Jurisdiction.—It is not the act done in pursuance of the conspiracy but the place where the conspiracy was formed or made which determines the jurisdiction of the Court.⁴ Hence, where the conspiracy was hatched in Bombay, where the accused lived, they were not held triable at Pollachi in Madras on a charge of criminal conspiracy for cheating the public at large.⁵

Sanction.—Sanction of the Provincial Government is necessary before instituting proceedings under this section;⁶ but no sanction is needed where the object of the conspiracy was to commit cognizable offences punishable with rigorous imprisonment for more than two years.⁷

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, agreed to do (or caused to be done) [an illegal act, to wit—] [an act, viz.—by illegal means, to wit—] and that same act, viz.—, was done in pursuance of the agreement] and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 120B of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance [or the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court)].

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

The charge of conspiracy must not be indefinite. The counts must state the illegal purpose and design of the agreement entered into between the accused with such proper and sufficient certainty as to lead to the necessary conclusion that it was an agreement to do an act in violation of the law.⁸

It is legal to try accused persons on a charge of conspiracy to commit an offence even if the substantive offence has been carried out.⁹

When two or more persons have conspired together for committing some offence, and one or more of them have committed that offence in pursuance of the conspiracy but others have not, it is permissible to charge and try them together for the conspiracy as also for the substantive offence.¹⁰

A charge is not bad because it states no definite date on which the accused agreed, or the names of persons in respect of whom the conspirators agreed to commit an offence.¹¹

A charge of criminal conspiracy under this section to commit an offence does not vitiate a charge of abetment of another offence if the charge of criminal conspiracy under this section does not relate to the latter offence.¹²

There is no misjoinder of charges where the accused are charged with criminal conspiracy to steal Government timber during a stated period and also with the offence of habitually receiving and dealing in such stolen timber during the same period in pursuance of the said conspiracy. But if the charge includes dealings with persons outside the conspiracy, there would be a misjoinder such as would vitiate the trial.¹³ The joinder of charges for specific acts of cheating and forgery with the charge of conspiracy, at one trial, is not illegal especially in a case where the specific counts of cheating as well as forgery are so closely connected that they really form part of one and the same transaction.¹⁴

Punishment.—The punishment for conspiracy is the same as if the conspirator had abetted the offence. The punishment varies according as the offence has or has not been committed in consequence of the conspiracy. If an offence has been committed, the punishment is that provided by s. 109 of the Code, though, strictly speaking, there should not be a conviction in such cases of conspiracy but of abetment. If it has not been committed, the punishment is governed by s. 116 of the Code.¹⁵ Where, for instance, there is only a conspiracy to manufacture arms, without an actual manufacture, the sentence should be imposed under this section read with s. 19(a) of the Arms Act (XI of 1878) and s. 116 of the Code, and the maximum term of imprisonment awardable under these sections is nine months' rigorous imprisonment.¹⁶ In a case of conspiracy to murder under s. 109 if the deceased was murdered in consequence of that conspiracy, the punishment is either death or transportation for life. If, on the other hand, murder is not committed in consequence of the conspiracy then under s. 115 the maximum punishment is rigorous imprisonment for seven years. In any case a sentence of ten years' rigorous imprisonment is illegal.¹⁷

The offence of conspiracy is a separate offence from the offence of participation in a particular dacoity or the dishonest reception of property stolen in a dacoity knowing it to be stolen. Separate sentences can be awarded to run consecutively for participation in separate dacoities and to these can also be added a consecutive sentence of participation in conspiracy.¹⁸ Acts done in pursuance of the conspiracy cannot be separately punished unless these acts are separately charged and particularised as required by the Criminal Procedure Code.¹⁹

Where the objects of a conspiracy are actually and in fact carried out within a very short time, separate sentences under this section are not called for.²⁰

CHAPTER VI.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE STATE.

Waging or attempting to wage war or abetting waging of war against the Queen.

121. Whoever¹ wages war² against the Queen³, or attempts to wage such war, or abets the waging of such war⁴, shall be punished with death, or transportation for life, and shall also be liable to fine.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A joins an insurrection against the Queen. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(b) A in India abets an insurrection against the Queen's Government of Ceylon by sending arms to the insurgents. A is guilty of abetting the waging of war against the Queen.

COMMENT.

Principle.—The section embraces every description of war, whether by insurrection or invasion, or war beyond our territories; and complicity in an abetment of insurrection, invasion, or foreign war; and further a British subject residing in British territory, who abets the waging of war against the British Government outside British territory, is guilty, no matter whether the British Government takes the initiative and invades the hostile territory or awaits the attack of the enemy, or whether the persons waging war are foreigners or persons owing allegiance to the Queen.¹

To constitute this offence no specified number of persons is necessary.² Neither the number of persons nor the manner in which they are assembled or armed is material to constitute an offence under this section. The true criterion is the purpose or intention with which the gathering assembled. The object of the gathering must be to attain by force and violence, an object of a general public nature thereby striking directly against the King's authority.³

There is a difference, says Foster,⁴ "between those insurrections which have carried the appearance of an army formed under leaders, and provided with military weapons, and with drums, colours, etc., and those other disorderly tumultuous assemblies which have been drawn together and conducted to purposes manifestly unlawful, but without any of the ordinary shew and apparatus of war before mentioned.

"I do not think any great stress can be laid on that distinction. It is true, that in case of levying war the indictments generally charge, that the defendants were armed and arrayed in a warlike manner; and, where the case would admit of it, the other circumstances of swords, guns, drums, colours, etc., have been added. But I think the merits of the case have never turned singly on any of these circumstances.

"In the cases of Damaree and Purchase, . . . there was nothing given in evidence of the usual pageantry of war, no military weapons, no banners or drums, nor any regular consultation previous to the rising; and yet the want of these circumstances weighed nothing with the court, though the prisoners' counsel insisted much on that matter. The number of the insurgents supplied the want of military weapons; and they were provided with axes, crowes, and other tools of the like nature, proper for the mischief they intended to effect. . .

"The true criterion therefore in all these cases is, Quo animo did the parties assemble? For if the assembly be upon account of some private quarrel, or to take revenge on particular persons, the statute of treasons hath already determined that point in favour of the subject. . .

"Upon the same principle and within the reason and equity of the statute, risings to maintain a private claim of right, or to destroy particular inclosures, or to remove nuisances, which affected or were thought to affect in point of interest the parties assembled for these purposes, or to break prisons in order to release particular persons without any other circumstance of aggravation, have not been holden to amount to levying war within the statute."

The offence of engaging in a conspiracy to wage war, and that of abetting the waging of war against the King, under this section, are offences against the Penal Code only, and are not treason or misprison of treason.⁵ Compare Act XI of 1857, s. 1.

1. 'Whoever.'—The Law Commissioners say :—"The laws of a particular nation or country cannot be applied to any persons but such as owe allegiance to the Government of the country, which allegiance is either perpetual, as in the case of a subject by birth or naturalization, &c., or temporary as in the case of a foreigner residing in the country. They are applicable of course to all such as thus owe allegiance to the Government, whether as subjects or foreigners, excepting as excepted by reservations or limitations which are parts of the laws in question."⁶

2. 'Wages war.'—These words "seem naturally to import a levying of war by one who throwing off the duty of allegiance arrays himself in open defiance of this Sovereign in like manner and by the like means as a foreign enemy would do, having gained footing within the realm."⁷ There must be an insurrection, there must be force accompanying that insurrection, and it must be for an object of a general nature.⁸

The word "wages" has the same meaning as "levying" used in the English statute. In *Lord George Gordon's case*⁹ Lord Mansfield said : "There are two kinds of levying war :—one against the person of the king; to imprison, to dethrone, or to kill him; or to make him change measures, or remove counsellors :—the other, which is said to be levied against the majesty of the king, or, in other words, against him in his regal capacity; as when a multitude rise and assemble to attain by force and violence any object of a general public nature; that is levying war against the majesty of the king; and most reasonably so held, because it tends to dissolve all the bonds of society, to destroy property, and to overturn government; and by force of arms, to restrain the king from reigning according to law."

"Every insurrection which in judgment of law is intended against the person of the King, be it to dethrone or imprison him, or to oblige him to alter his measures of government, or to remove evil counsellors from about him,—these risings all amount to levying war within the statute, whether attended with the pomp and circumstances of open war or not : and every conspiracy to levy war for these purposes, though not treason within the clause of levying war, is yet an overt act within the other clause of compassing the King's death..."

"Insurrections in order to throw all inclosures, to alter the established law or change religion, to enhance the price of all labour or to open all prisons,—all risings in order to effect these innovations of a public and general concern by an armed force are, in construction of law, high treason, within the clause of levying war : for though they are not levelled at the person of the King, they are against his Royal Majesty; and besides, they have a direct tendency to dissolve all the bonds of society, and to destroy all property and all government too, by numbers and an armed force. Insurrections likewise for redressing national grievances, or for the expulsion of foreigners in general, or indeed of any single nation living here under the protection of the King, or for the reformation of real or imaginary evils of a public nature and in which the insurgents have no special interest,—risings to effect these ends by force and numbers are, by construction of law, within the clause of levying war : for they are levelled at the King's Crown and Royal Dignity."¹⁰

An assembly armed and arrayed in a warlike manner for any treasonable purpose is bellum levatum, though not bellum percussum. Lifting and marching are sufficient overt acts without coming to a battle or action.¹¹ warlike kind it may be attended, will make an attack by one subject on another high treason. On the other hand, any amount of violence, however insignificant, directed against the King will be high treason, and as soon as violence has any political object, it is impossible to say that it is not directed against the king, in the sense of being armed opposition to the lawful exercise of his power.¹² Where the object of a mob is not mere resistance to a District Magistrate but the total subversion of the British power and the establishment of the Khilafat Government, a person forming part of it and taking part in its actions is guilty of waging war.¹³ When a multitude rises and assembles to attain by force and violence any object of a general public nature, it amounts to levying war against the King. It is not the number of the force, but the purpose and intention, that constitute the offence and distinguish it from riot or any other rising for a private purpose. The law knows no distinction between principal and accessory, and all who take part in the treasonable act incur the same guilt. In rebellion cases it frequently happens that few are let into the real design, but yet all that join in it are guilty of the rebellion. A deliberate and an organized attack upon the Crown forces would amount to a waging of war if the object of the insurgents was by armed force and violence to overcome the servants of the Crown and thereby to prevent the general collection of the capitation-tax.¹⁴

"There is a diversity between levying of war and committing of a great riot, a rout, or an unlawful assembly. For example, as if three, or four, or more, do rise to burn, or put down an inclosure in Dale, which the lord of the manor of Dale hath made there in that particular place; this or the like is a riot, a rout, or an unlawful assembly, and no treason. But if they had risen of purpose to alter religion established within the realm, or laws, or to go from town to town generally, and to cast down inclosures, this is a levying of war (though there be great number of the conspirators) within the purview of this statute, because the pretence is public and general, and not private in particular.¹⁵

Where the rioting or tumult is merely to accomplish some private purpose, interesting only to those engaged in it, not resisting or calling in question the King's authority or prerogative, then the tumult, however numerous or outrageous the mob may be, is only a riot. But whenever the rising or insurrection has for its object a general purpose, not confined to the peculiar interests of the persons concerned in it, but common to the whole community, and striking directly against the King's authority, then it assumes the character of treason. The numbers concerned and the manner in which they were equipped or armed are not material.¹⁶

The Calcutta High Court has held that the expression 'wages war' must be construed in its ordinary sense, and a conspiracy to wage war, or the collection of men, arms and ammunition for that purpose, is not waging war.¹⁷

3. 'Against the Queen.'—The word 'Queen' denotes the Sovereign for the time being of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland (s. 13).

4. 'Abets the waging of such war.'—It is not essential that as a result of the abetment the war should be waged in fact. But the main purpose of the instigation should be the waging of the war. It should not be merely a remote and incidental purpose, but the thing principally aimed at by the instigator. The mere fact that a person may try to do it in an indirect and disguised manner would not be sufficient to save him from the operation of the section; but the Court ought to be satisfied that he has instigated the waging of war, i.e., the use of violence for the purpose of effecting innovations of a general and public nature.¹⁸

The authors of the Code say: "We have...made the abetting of hostilities against the Government, in certain cases, a separate offence, instead of leaving it to the operation of the general law laid down in the chapter on abetment. We have done so for two reasons. In the first place, war may be waged against the Government by persons in whom it is no offence to wage such war, by foreign princes and their subjects. Our general rules on the subject of abetment would apply to the case of a person residing in the British territories who should abet a subject of the British Government in waging war against that Government; but they would not reach the case of a person who, while residing in the British territories, should abet the waging of war by any foreign prince against the British Government. In the second place, we agree with the great body of legislators in thinking, that though in general a person who has been a party to a criminal design which has not been carried into effect, ought not to be punished so severely as if that design had been carried into effect, yet an exception to this rule must be made with respect to high offences against the state; for state-crimes, and especially the most heinous and formidable state-crimes, have this peculiarity, that if they are successfully committed, the criminal is almost always secure from punishment. The murderer is in greater danger after his victim is despatched than before. The thief is in greater danger after the purse is taken than before. But the rebel is out of danger as soon as he has subverted the Government. As the penal law is impotent against a successful rebel, it is consequently necessary that it should be made strong and sharp against the first beginnings of rebellion, against treasonable designs which have been carried no further than plots and preparations. We have therefore not thought it expedient to leave such plots and preparations to the ordinary law of abetment. Under that general law, a conspiracy for the subversion of the Government would not be punished at all if the conspirators were detected before they had done more than discuss plans, adopt resolutions and interchange promises of fidelity. A conspiracy for the subversion of the Government, which should be carried as far as the gun-powder treason or the assassination plot against William the Third, would be punished very much less severely than the counterfeiting of a rupee, or the presenting of a forged cheque. We have, therefore, thought it absolutely necessary to make separate provision for the previous abetting of great state offences. The subsequent abetting of such offences may, we think, without inconvenience, be left to be dealt with according to the general law."¹⁹ It may be noted in view of the last sentence that s. 121A which deals with conspiracies was added to the Code subsequently.

Under the English law, mere words spoken or written, however wicked and abominable, if they do not relate to any act or design then actually on foot against the life of the King or the levying of a war against him and in the contemplation of the speaker, do not amount to treason. Under the Penal Code, the waging or levying of a war and the abetting of it are put upon the same footing by this section. That is, the abetting of the waging of war is under the Code as much an offence of treason as the waging of war itself.

According to the general law as to abetment (s. 108, expln. 2), to constitute the offence of abetment it is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed, or that the effect requisite to constitute the offence should be caused. This applies to the abetment of any other offence under the Code. The only difference created between the former offence and other offences is that, while under the general law as to abetment a distinction is made for the purposes of punishment between abetment which has succeeded, and abetment which has failed, this section does away with that distinction so far as the offence of waging war is concerned and deals equally with an abettor whose instigation has led to a war and one whose instigation has taken no effect whatever.²⁰

The word "abets" in this section does not mean something less than that word as used in s. 107. The abetment contemplated under the former section need not be abetment of some war in progress; there may be and usually is instigation of rebellion before rebellion actually begins: instigation of this kind is abetting the waging of war against the King. So long as a man only tries to inflame feeling, to excite a state of mind, he is not guilty of anything more than sedition. It is only when he definitely and clearly incites to action that he is guilty of instigating and therefore of abetting the waging of war.²¹

The accused published a book of poems wherein a spirit of blood-thirstiness and murderous eagerness directed against the Government and "White" rulers ran through the poems; the urgency of taking up the sword was conveyed in unambiguous language; and an appeal of blood-thirsty incitement was made to the people to take up the sword, form secret societies, and adopt guerilla warfare for the purpose of rooting out "the demon" of foreign rule. It was held that the poems conveyed to readers an instigation to wage war; and that the offence of abetting the waging of war was committed.²²

Inducing or assisting subjects of a State at war to return to their own country after declaration of war will amount to abetment.²³

If a British subject does an act which strengthens or tends to strengthen the enemies of the King in the conduct of a war against the King, or which weakens or tends to weaken the power of the King and of the country to resist or attack the enemies of the King and country, he gives aid and comfort to the King's enemies within the meaning of the Treason Act.²⁴ The United Kingdom being at war with Germany, a British subject went to Germany and there endeavoured to persuade other British subjects, who were prisoners of war in Germany, to join the armed forces of the enemy, and took part in an attempt to land arms and ammunition in Ireland for the use of the enemy, it was held that he was guilty of high treason.²⁵ Such conduct will amount to abetment under this section.

Constructive levying of war.—"Constructive levying of war is in truth more directed against the government than the person of the king; though in legal construction it is a levying of war against the king himself. This is when an insurrection is raised to reform some national grievance, to alter the established law or religion, to punish magistrates, to introduce innovation of a public concern, to obstruct the execution of some general law by an armed force, or for any other purpose which usurps the government in matters of a public and general nature. On the trial of Lord George Gordon the Court of King's Bench declared their unanimous opinion that an attempt, by intimidation and violence to force the repeal of a law, was a levying war against the king. The statute in question was the 18 Geo. 3, c. 60, for relieving Roman catholics from certain penalties; and the treasonable acts given in evidence against the prisoner was the assembling a great multitude of people, and encouraging them to surround the two houses of parliament and commit different acts of violence there and elsewhere, with a view to intimidate them to a repeal of the statute. Insurrections of this nature, though not levelled directly against the person of the King, are yet an attack upon his regal office, and tend to dissolve all government, society, and order. The king is bound in duty to enforce the acts of the legislature and uphold their authority: any resistance, therefore, to these, must, in its consequences, extend to the endangering of his person and government, by involving the state in a general distraction; on which account this species of treason falls properly within the clause of levying war against the king...

"Of the same nature is an assembling together for the purpose of destroying all meeting houses or all bawdy houses, under colour of reforming a public grievance; or an insurrection to reduce by force the general price of victuals, to enhance the common rate of wages, to level all enclosures, to expel all foreigners, to release all prisoners, or to reform by numbers or an armed force any real or imaginary grievance, of a public and general nature, in which the insurgents have no peculiar interest. Against such insurrections magistrates, sheriffs, and indeed all private persons, may use force to suppress them without any special commission, in the same manner as they may oppose foreign enemies coming hostilely into the kingdom."¹

Foreigners.—All persons owing allegiance to the sovereign may be guilty of this offence, but not foreigners, who owe no allegiance and for whom the Indian Legislature has no power to make laws. Therefore, a prince or subject of a foreign State by which war is lawfully waged against our Government, is not within the meaning of the section. But foreigners owing local allegiance are within the section.³

CASES.

The accused was seen in the front rank of a crowd of two or three thousand persons which attacked a force of police and military with swords, knives and bludgeons. The police had to fire in self-defence and it was only after nine persons were killed and three wounded that the mob retreated. The accused was then arrested and at his direction the mob dispersed. The accused had for some time previously been engaged in a propaganda to the effect that no revenue should be paid to the Government and that people should non-co-operate with it. The accused had also been setting up a mock Court of Justice. On the morning of the occurrence the accused had addressed a meeting saying that those present should subvert the British Raj and establish the Khilafat Government and that all Government offices, railways and telegraphs must be destroyed. In the crowd there was carried by the side of the accused a flag in the front of the mob in which there was the following inscription: “God the greatest. The Khilafat go to work light-mindedly and you will certainly succeed and God will be with you.” It was held that the accused was guilty of the offence of waging war against the King.⁵

The accused delivered a speech in support of his plea for a change in the wording of the aims and objects of the Muslim League, viz. “the attainment of Swaraj by the people of India by all peaceful and legitimate means”, by substituting the words “possible and proper” for the words “peaceful and legitimate”. In the course of the speech, he advocated the immediate starting of a parallel Government independent of all British control, by setting up on a separate and permanent foundation Courts, schools, art, industry, commerce, army, police and national parliament, with a view to obtain Swaraj. The speaker contemplated the present establishment of the above by peaceful and non-violent means; but he dipped into the future and foresaw that if the British Government resorted to repression and martial law, he apprehended that the Mahomedans at least would carry on guerilla warfare or in the words of the Koran “Kill them whenever you find them.” He further developed the point by stating: “So long as the Government confines to the use of chains and fetters non-co-operation can remain peaceful as it is to-day, but if things go further and Government has recourse to gallows or machine-guns it will be impossible for the moment to remain non-violent.” It was held that the main theme of the speech having been the change in the aims and objects of the League and the immediate starting of a parallel Government, the accused had committed no offence under this section which required a clear and direct incitement to action as distinguished from a state of mind.⁶

The District Magistrate of a district marched to a place called Tirurangadi with a posse of soldiers and reserve police to arrest certain Khilafat leaders. Next morning after arrests had been effected a large body of Mopillas were marching from the west. The District Magistrate and the Deputy Inspector-General took a column of 120 police and 60 soldiers to meet them. One and a half miles from Tirurangadi they saw a big mob fifty yards away. The Deputy Superintendent went forward and ordered the mob to disperse but it came straight on in regular formation with two flags and a number of men in front. There were twenty-four swords. The police charged them with the bayonet and some of the police fired their guns. The mob then retired about thirty yards and those who had weapons dropped them. The accused was seen in front of the mob with a stick. It was held that it was doubtful whether the part taken by the accused could be said to be waging war under this section.⁷

Where, with the object of overthrowing the existing Government, certain rebels planned a raid with a view of obtaining recruits from a certain place and of punishing those who did not help the rebel cause, it was held that those who took part in the raids were guilty of waging war.⁸

The accused was an 'influential' man in a village which was a hot-bed of the rebellion. He was the president of the wounthun athin whose activities in regard to capitation tax were the preliminaries to the rebellion. When the rebellion broke out he assisted the rebels by feeding them after a battle and helped in getting persons tattooed, i.e., enrolled as participants in, or sympathisers of, the rebellion. He took a leading part in the resistance of the villagers to the payment of capitation tax, and it was within a few days of his holding a meeting in regard to the non-payment of capitation tax that several of the villagers disappeared and joined the rebels. It was held that there were sufficient grounds for holding that the accused abetted the waging of war against the King-Emperor.⁹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused waged war, or attempted to do so, or abetted the same.

(2) That such war was against the King-Emperor.

It is not incumbent on the accused to show what the object and meaning of the acts done was, but it is the duty of the prosecutors to make out their case against the accused.¹⁰ In a case in which the accused was charged with abetting the waging of war against the Queen it was held that the Calcutta Gazette and the Gazette of India were admissible in evidence to prove the proclamation and official communications of the Government relating to the war.¹¹

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is necessary before prosecution could be instituted under this section.¹²

Where an order under s. 196 of the Criminal Procedure Code authorized a particular police-officer to prefer a complaint of offences under ss. 121A, 122, 123 and 124 of the Penal Code, "or under any other section of the said Code which may be found applicable to the case," and the examination of the complainant also referred to the same sections, it was held that no complaint under this section was thereby authorized by the Local Government or in fact preferred, that the Magistrate had no power to commit thereunder, and that the defect was not cured by a subsequent order obtained while the case was before the Sessions Court, authorizing a complaint under the section which was not in fact made thereafter; nor did s. 532 of the Criminal Procedure Code apply in such a case.¹³

The Local Government cannot delegate to any other body or person the controlling power and discretion of determining whether cognizance shall be taken by the Court of an offence mentioned in s. 196 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and its judgment must be specifically directed to the particular section, and no other, under which the prosecution is to be carried on, and the order or authority should be preceded by a deliberate determination in this respect. An order authorizing a complaint under certain specified section "or under any other section found applicable" if it means found by any one other than Government, involves a delegation which cannot be sustained.¹⁴

The sanction of the Local Government must be strictly proved in the manner laid down in s. 78 of the Evidence Act, and the identity of the accused with the person named in the sanction must be established.¹⁵

In enacting this section, the Legislature has not thought fit to limit in any way the period within which a prosecution for an offence against it may be commenced as in the case of the English statute.¹⁶

Joinder of charges.—Charges under ss. 121A, 122 and 123 can be joined together.¹⁷

The waging of war is a continuing offence and a charge against the accused under this section, specifying more than three offences committed in the course of the war, and spread over a period of more than one year, does not contravene the provisions of s. 134 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and is not illegal.¹⁸

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows :—

That you, on or about the — day of —, at —, waged war (or attempted to wage war, or abetted the waging of war) against His Majesty the King-Emperor of India, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 121 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (when the charge is framed by a Presidency Magistrate, for Court of Session substitute High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.¹⁹

121A. Whoever¹ within or without British India² conspires³ to commit any of the offences punishable by section 121, or to deprive the Queen of the sovereignty of British India⁴, of British Burma or of any part thereof, or conspires to overawe, by means of criminal force⁵ or the show of criminal force, the Central Government or any Provincial Government⁶ or the Government of Burma, shall be punished with transportation for life or any shorter term, or with imprisonment of either description which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—To constitute a conspiracy under this section, it is not necessary that any act or illegal omission shall take place in pursuance thereof.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section provides for the offence of conspiring to wage war against the King. Before this section was introduced²⁰ such a conspiracy was punishable only when it amounted to an abetment, that is, when an act or illegal omission took place in pursuance of that conspiracy. The present section immensely tightens the grip of the law on treasonable combinations. It is similar to the Treason Felony Act²¹ passed in 1848.

Under this section conspiracy itself is a crime and it is not necessary to establish any illegal act or illegal omission as overt acts of the conspiracy the existence of which has to be established. The illegal acts or omissions, if established, support the case of the existence of the conspiracy itself, the offence being complete even though two persons conspiring together go no further than the original agreement. There cannot be strictly speaking direct evidence of the inception of a conspiracy, if any of the conspirators themselves do not choose to speak to the same.²²

It was thought right to make the offence of conspiring by criminal force, or by show of criminal force, more severely penal than the offence of actually taking part in an unlawful assembly, having for its object the overawing of the Government. The reason was this, that persons who, by conspiring to bring about such a result, set the whole matter in motion, seemed more criminal and far more deserving of punishment than those who were their mere tools, and only took part in such an assembly.

The essence of an offence under this section is the agreement to do all or any of the unlawful acts mentioned in the section.²³

The provisions of the section are comprehensive and no formidable elements either in men or means are required to satisfy the definition of a conspiracy to wage war. No act or illegal omission is necessary for such a conspiracy, the mere agreement of two or more being sufficient. The determination of the Court in any case that a conspiracy to wage war has been established may not therefore necessarily imply the existence of a serious menace to the constitution or the stability of constituted authority in India.

Chapters IV, V and XXIII apply to this offence.²⁴

Ingredients.—The section deals with two kinds of conspiracies.—

1. Conspiring within or without British India (a) to commit any of the offences punishable by s. 121, or (b) to deprive the King of the sovereignty of British India or any part thereof.

2. Conspiring to overawe by means of criminal force, or the show of criminal force, the Government.

1. 'Whoever.'—See s. 121. When people take part, however little, in committing this offence, the fact that they were foolish or ignorant does not mitigate the offence.²⁵

2. 'British India.'—See s. 15, supra.

3. 'Conspires.'—See s. 107, supra. A conspiracy is a combination of two or more persons to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. It consists not merely in the intention of two or more, but in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means.¹ The explanation to this section says that to constitute a conspiracy it is not necessary that any act or illegal omission should take place in pursuance thereof.² The agreement in itself is enough to constitute the offence.³

Where several persons are charged with the same conspiracy, it is a legal impossibility that some should be found guilty of one conspiracy and some of another. An accused not shown to be a member of the conspiracy charged is entitled to demand an acquittal however bad his record may be and however much he may be suspected of this or that offence.⁴ Associations for music, gymnastic exercises and fencing with sticks amongst young men living in the same village or attending the same school are ordinary incidents of village or school life, and could hardly with propriety be proved as forming elements in any alleged scheme or conspiracy to wage war against the King-Emperor, and all the more so when they are shown to have been accompanied by a complete absence of secrecy and rather by a courting of publicity.⁵

If a conspirator has formed the intention to leave a conspiracy and ceases to be a conspirator by his own act and intention when the other conspirators wage war, he cannot be held guilty.⁶

4. 'To deprive the Queen of the sovereignty of British India.'—This expression corresponds to the clause "to deprive or depose him (King) or them (his successors) from the style, honour or the King's name of the Imperial Crown of this realm, or of any other of His Majesty's dominions or countries", existing in the English statute against conspiracies.⁷ Depriving His Majesty of the sovereignty of British India would obviously include the severance of the connection of India with the Imperial Government in England. Any conspiracy to establish the complete independence of India, as distinct from obtaining for it the status of self-governing Dominion within the British Empire, would be tantamount to conspiring to deprive His Majesty of the sovereignty of British India. The result would follow if there was a conspiracy to establish a perfect democratic or republican form of government in India outside the British Empire.

The reference to "The Queen" in this section is not a reference to the personality of the Sovereign for the time being. Section 13 of the Penal Code defines

"The Queen" as the Sovereign for the time being of the United Kingdom. For this section it is not necessary to establish that there is a conspiracy to deprive His Majesty the present King-Emperor of his sovereignty of British India, i.e., within the lifetime of the present King-Emperor; and the question whether the conspiracy is or is not expected or contemplated to succeed within the lifetime of the present King-Emperor is immaterial.⁸ A person has no right to attempt violently to overthrow by force the constitution as by law established and through which the sovereignty of the King-Emperor is exercised. As with the doctrines of political philosophers, so with the theories sound or unsound of constitutional law; they avail nothing against the plain provisions of the Penal Code.⁹

5. 'Criminal force.'—See s. 350, infra.

6. 'Central Government or any Provincial Government.'—This section obviously draws a distinction between the Sovereign for the time being of the United Kingdom and the Central Government or any Provincial Government. Any conspiracy to change the form of the Government, even though it may amount to an offence under another section of the Code, would not be an offence under this section, unless it is a conspiracy to overawe such Government by means of criminal force, or show of criminal force.¹⁰

Amendment.—The words "and shall also be liable to fine" were added by Act XVI of 1921, s. 3.

After the second "British India" the words "of British Burma" were inserted by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. The words "the Central Government or any Provincial Government or the Government of Burma" were substituted for the words "the Government of India or any Local Government" by the same Order. In Burma, the words "the sovereignty of British Burma or British India" were substituted for "the sovereignty of British India" and the words "the Government of Burma or any Government in British India" were substituted for "the Government of India or any Local Government" by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

PRACTICE.

An indictment or information for conspiracy must contain a statement of the facts relied upon as constituting the offence, in ordinary and concise language, with as much certainty as the nature of the case will admit.¹¹

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused had entered into a conspiracy. Though to establish a charge of conspiracy there must be an agreement, there need not be proof of direct meeting or combination, nor need the parties be brought into each other's presence. The agreement may be inferred from circumstances raising a presumption of a common concerted plan to carry out the unlawful design. Nor is it necessary that all should have joined in the scheme from the first; those who come in at a later stage are equally guilty, provided the agreement be proved.¹²

(2) That the conspiracy was to commit an offence punishable under s. 112 or to deprive the King-Emperor of the sovereignty of British India or to overawe by means of criminal force or show of criminal force the Central Government or any Provincial Government.

With reference to evidence admissible as part of the res gestæ in prosecutions for conspiracy, or generally of an offence committed by confederates, it is an established rule that any act done by one of the party in pursuance of the original concerted plan and with reference to their common intention is, in the contemplation of the law, the act of the whole party.¹³

If it be intended to give in evidence against the accused the acts of any other person it must be shown that such person was also a member of the same conspiracy, and that the act done was in furtherance of the common design. The prosecutor may either prove the conspiracy, which renders the acts of the conspirators admissible in evidence, or he may prove the acts of the different parties and so prove the conspiracy.

¹³ See Indian Evidence Act, 1872, s. 10.

When persons have been taken into custody and are in a condition which makes it impossible for them to act in aid or furtherance of the conspiracy, that is, when, so far as they are concerned, the conspiracy has come to an end, the acts of persons who were members of the conspiracy and who are still free to act in pursuance thereof, are not admissible as against them; these acts can no longer be deemed the acts of conspirators.

There is a distinction between persons who enter into a conspiracy for the sole purpose of detecting and betraying it, and others who concur fully in the criminal designs for a time and join in their accomplishment, till, from alarm, or from some other cause, they turn upon their former associates and give information against them. These latter persons may be truly called accomplices. There is not on the part of such persons as original purpose of discovering the secret designs of the conspirators and of disclosing them for the benefit of the public, which are the vital elements in this class of cases.

The prosecution is not obliged to prove that the persons accused actually met and laid their heads together and after a formal consultation came to an express agreement to do evil. On the contrary, if the facts as proved are such that the jury as reasonable men can say there was a common design and the prisoners were acting in concert to do what is wrong, that is evidence from which the jury may suppose that a conspiracy was actually formed.

It is from this point of view that overt acts may properly be looked to as evidence of the existence of a concerted intention; indeed, the conspiracy is usually loosely bound up with the overt acts, because, in many cases, it is only by means of the overt acts that the existence of the conspiracy can be made out. But the criminality of the conspiracy is independent of the criminality of the overt acts.

If it is not necessary to establish by direct evidence that the accused persons did enter into an agreement to conspire. The criminality of the conspiracy lies in the concerned intention, and once reasonable grounds are made out for belief in the existence of the conspiracy amongst the accused, the acts of each conspirator in furtherance of its object are evidence against each of the others; and this, whether such acts were done before or after his entry into the combination, in his presence, or in his absence.¹⁴

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Joinder of charges.—Where more than two persons are charged with conspiracy, it does not follow that either all the conspirators must be convicted or they must be all acquitted. Where the accused were all alleged to have been members of a secret society, with its headquarters in Maniktolla in the suburbs, and its places of meeting in Calcutta and elsewhere, and to have joined in the unlawful enterprise, and with others, known and unknown, to have conspired to wage war or to deprive the King of the sovereignty of British India, and to have collected arms and ammunition with such intent and to have actually waged war; it was held that the joint trial of the accused on charges under s. 121, this section, and ss. 122 and 123 was not bad for misjoinder of persons or charges.¹⁵

Sanction.—No Court shall take cognizance of an offence under this section unless the prosecution is instituted under the authority of Government.¹⁶

The requirement of law that complaint under the section should not be made without special authority from Government is no doubt due in part to the fact that a charge framed in terms of that section is calculated to produce an impression that a political situation of the gravest character has arisen.¹⁷

Charge.—Where the accused were charged with having conspired with one another and other persons known and unknown to wage war against His Majesty, it was held that the charge could not be sustained if the known persons were mentioned in it.¹⁸

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, or on about the—day of—, at—(if the place is without British India mention so) conspired to wage war (or to abet the waging of war) against His Majesty the King-Emperor, (or conspired to deprive the King-Emperor of the sovereignty of British India or of some part thereof, or conspired to overawe by means of criminal force or show of criminal force the Government of India, etc.) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 121A of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

Sentence.—The severity of sentences should vary with the degree of the seriousness of the acts done by each accused who is convicted.¹⁹

122. Whoever¹ collects men, arms or ammunition or otherwise prepares² to wage war with the intention of either waging or being prepared to wage war against the Queen, shall be punished with transportation for life or imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Collecting arms, etc., with intention of waging war against the Queen.

COMMENT.

This section is intended to put down with a heavy hand any preparation to wage war against the King-Emperor. The acts made punishable by it cannot be considered attempts : they are in truth preparation made for committing the offence of waging war. This section and ss. 126 and 399 make preparation to commit an offence punishable. Preparation is a stage prior to an attempt. See s. 511, infra, for a discussion of the terms 'attempt' and 'preparation.'

1. 'Whoever.'—See s. 121, supra.

2. 'Or otherwise prepares.'—Any kind of preparation for waging war, e.g., making or strengthening a fort.

3. 'The Queen.'—See s. 13, supra.

Amendment.—The words "also be liable to fine" were substituted for the words "forfeit all his property" by Act XVI of 1921, s. 2.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused collected men, arms, etc.

(2) That he did collect men, arms, etc., with intent to wage war, or was prepared to wage war.

(3) That such war was against the King.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session.

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is required for prosecution under this section.²⁰

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you—on or about the—day of—, at—, collected men (or arms or ammunition, if any other means were adopted mention those) with the intention of waging war (or being prepared to wage war) against His Majesty the King-Emperor, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 122 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

²⁰ Criminal Procedure Code, s. 196.

123. Whoever¹, by any act², or by any illegal omission³, conceals the existence of a design to wage war⁴ against the Queen⁵, intending by such concealment to facilitate, or knowing it to be likely that such concealment will facilitate, the waging of such war, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

This section merely lays down the principle enunciated in s. 118, the only difference being that the penalty under this section is severer. Section 44 of the Code of Criminal Procedure says : “(1) Every person, whether within or without the presidency-towns, aware of the commission of, or of the intention of any other person to commit any offence punishable under any of the following sections of the Indian Penal Code (namely) 121, 121A, 122, 123, 124, 124A, 125, 126, 130, 143, 144, 145, 147, 148, 302, 303, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 456, 457, 458, 459 and 460, shall, in the absence of reasonable excuse, the burden of proving which shall lie upon the person so aware, forthwith give information to the nearest Magistrate or police-officer of such commission or intention.

(2) For the purposes of this section the term ‘offence’ includes any act committed at any place out of British India which would constitute an offence if committed in British India.”

1. ‘Whoever.’—See s. 121, supra.

4. ‘Wage war’.—See s. 121, supra.

2. ‘Act.’—See s. 33, supra.

5. ‘The Queen.’—See s. 13, supra.

3. ‘Omission.’—See s. 33, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the existence of a design to wage war against the King.

(2) That the accused knew of such design.

(3) That he concealed the same.

(4) That he intended thereby to facilitate the waging of such war; or that he knew that it was likely that such concealment would facilitate the same.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session.

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is necessary for prosecution under this section.²¹

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you—knowing that on or about the—day of—, at—, certain persons had design to wage war against the King-Emperor, concealed the existence of such design by (mention the act or omission) intending by such concealment to facilitate (or knowing it to be likely that such concealment would facilitate) the waging of such war, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 123 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

124. Whoever, with the intention of inducing or compelling the Governor General of India, or the Governor of any Province, or a Member of the Council of the Governor General of India, to exercise or refrain from exercising in any manner any of the lawful powers of such Governor General, Governor, or Member of Council, Assaulting Governor General, Governor, etc., with intent to compel or restrain the exercise of any lawful power.

assaults¹ or wrongfully restrains², or attempts wrongfully to restrain, or overawes, by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force, or attempts so to overawe, such Governor General, Governor, or Member of Council, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

This section is an amplification of the third clause of s. 121A. It punishes severely assaults, etc., made on high officers of Government.

1. 'Assaults.'—See s. 351, infra. 2. 'Wrongfully restrains.'—See s. 339, infra.

Amendment.—In Burma the following section has been substituted for this section by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

124. Whoever, with the intention of inducing or compelling the Governor to exercise or refrain from exercising in any manner any of the lawful powers of the Governor, assaults or wrongfully restrains, or attempts wrongfully to restrain, or overawes by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force, or attempts so to overawe, the Governor shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person assaulted, etc., was one of the persons described in this section.

(2) That the accused assaulted such person, or attempted to do so; or that the accused wrongfully restrained him or attempted to do so; or that the accused used criminal force or show thereof.

(3) That the accused did as mentioned in (2) in order to overawe that person, or in the attempt to do so [see Assault, Criminal Force, Wrongful Restraint].

(4) That the accused did as above with the intention of inducing or compelling that person to exercise, or to refrain from exercising, any of his lawful powers.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session.

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is necessary for prosecution under this section.²²

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, with the intention of inducing the Hon'ble A. B., Member of the Council of the Governor-General of India, to refrain from exercising a lawful power as such Member, assaulted such Member, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 124 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge. (Vide Criminal Procedure Code, Sch. V, No. xxviii, 2.) 124A. Whoever¹ by words, either spoken or written², or by signs, or by visible representation³, or otherwise, brings or attempts⁴ to bring into hatred or contempt⁵, or excites or attempts to excite disaffection⁶ towards, Her Majesty⁷ or the Crown Representative or the Government established by law in British India,⁸ or British Burma, shall be punished with transportation for life or any shorter term, to which fine may be added, or with imprisonment which may extend to three years, to which fine may be added, or with fine.

Sedition.

²² Criminal Procedure Code, s. 196.

Explanation 1.—The expression “disaffection” includes disloyalty and all feelings of enmity.⁹

*Explanation 2*¹⁰.—Comments expressing disapprobation¹¹ of the measures of the Government with a view to obtain their alteration by lawful means, without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection, do not constitute an offence under this section.

Explanation 3.—Comments expressing disapprobation of the administrative or other action of the Government without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection, do not constitute an offence under this section.

COMMENT.

Sedition is a crime against society, nearly allied to that of treason, and it frequently precedes treason by a short interval. Sedition in itself is a comprehensive term, and it embraces all those practices, whether by word, deed, or writing, which are calculated to disturb the tranquillity of the State, and lead ignorant persons to endeavour to subvert the Government and laws of the Empire. The objects of sedition generally are to induce discontent and insurrection, and stir up opposition to the Government, and bring the administration of justice into contempt; and the very tendency of sedition is to incite the people to insurrection and rebellion. “Sedition has been described as disloyalty in action, and the law considers as sedition all those practices which have for their object to excite discontent or dissatisfaction, to create public disturbance, or to lead to civil war; to bring into hatred or contempt the Sovereign or the Government, the laws or constitutions of the realm, and generally all endeavours to promote public disorder.”²³

By Act IV of 1898 the present section was substituted for the former section which stood thus :—

“Whoever by words, either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs, or by visible representation, or otherwise, excites or attempts to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India, shall be punished with transportation for life or for any term, to which fine may be added, or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, to which fine may be added, or with fine.

Explanation.—Such a disapprobation of the measures of the Government as is compatible with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government, and to support the lawful authority of the Government against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist that authority, is not disaffection. Therefore, the making of comments on the measures of the Government, with the intention of exciting only this species of disapprobation, is not an offence within this clause.”

The above section, together with s. 121A, was avowedly inserted in this Chapter relating to offences against the State, with a view to fill up an inadvertent omission of a special provision for the punishment of the offence of abetment or rebellion. In the words of Sir Fitz James Stephen, it was felt that as the causes which produce rebellion are wide, and spread over a longer period, a wider definition of abetment in the case of rebellion was necessary than sufficed in the case of theft or murder. In giving effect to this view, the principles of the English statute and common law were followed, and the section, as originally drafted by the Indian Law Commissioners in 1837, was finally incorporated in the Code in 1870,²⁴ as substantially representing the law of England of the present day “though much more compressed, and more distinctly expressed.”²⁵

The present section differs from the repealed section in four ways :

(1) In the repealed section, the offence consisted in exciting or attempting to excite feelings of “disaffection”, in the present section, in addition to this the feeling of “hatred” or “contempt” is made punishable.

(2) In the old section the object of the feeling was "the Government established by law in British India", in the new section, in addition to this "Her Majesty" is also made the object of such feeling.

(3) The offence under the old section was designated "Exciting disaffection", under the new it is called "Sedition."

(4) The old section had one Explanation, the new has three, and they differ from the former.

Principle.—The offence of sedition consists in exciting or attempting to excite in others certain bad feelings towards (a) the King-Emperor, or (b) towards the Government. Defamatory statements concerning the Sovereign will be punished under this section. The provisions of this section are very wide and in strict law they would cover every thing that amounts to defamation of the Government if one excludes from the meaning of that term any criticism in good faith of any particular measures or any acts of administration.¹

The offence does not consist in "exciting or attempting to excite mutiny or rebellion, or any sort of actual disturbance, great or small. Whether any disturbance or outbreak was caused by these articles, is absolutely immaterial. If the accused intended by the articles to excite rebellion or disturbance, his act would doubtless fall within s. 124A, and would probably fall within other sections of the Penal Code. But even if he neither excited nor intended to excite any rebellion or outbreak or forcible resistance to the authority of the Government, still if he tried to excite feelings of enmity to the Government, that is sufficient to make him guilty under the section."² A direct incitement to stir up disorder or rebellion is not necessary.³

The Privy Council has laid down, in an appeal from the Gold Coast Colony in which it was contended that the prosecution in a case of sedition could not succeed unless the words complained of were themselves of such a nature as to be likely to incite to violence, that under the law of sedition of the Gold Coast Colony, which is clearly expressed in its own Criminal Code and is to be found there and not in English and Scottish cases or any glosses derived therefrom, incitement to violence is not one of the necessary ingredients of the crime of sedition.⁴ The Federal Court of India held in a case that public disorder, or the reasonable anticipation or likelihood of public disorder, was the gist of the offence. The acts or words complained of must either incite to disorder or must be such as to satisfy reasonable men that that was their intention or tendency.⁵ The decision of the Federal Court of India was reluctantly followed by the Allahabad⁶ and the Bombay⁷ High Courts as it was a Court of superior authority, although they did not agree with the principle laid down by it. On appeal by the Crown from the decision of the Bombay High Court the Privy Council has overruled the view of the Federal Court and held that there is nothing in the language of this section to suggest that the acts or words complained of must either incite to disorder or must be such as to satisfy reasonable men that that is their intention or tendency. Explanation I, which defines "disaffection" as including disloyalty and all feelings of enmity, is quite inconsistent with the suggestion that "excites or attempts to excite disaffection" involves not only excitation of feelings of disaffection but also exciting disorder. Incitement to violence is not, therefore, a necessary ingredient of the crime of sedition.⁸

Scope.—This section places absolutely on the same footing the successful exciting of feelings of disaffection and the unsuccessful attempt to excite them.

The offence consists in the making use of any means for the purpose of bringing the Government into hatred or contempt.

There must be, first of all, words which are capable of a meaning that can be labelled seditious, and, further, the accused should have the intention of actually exciting or causing the feelings that are mentioned in the section.⁹

Intention essential.—The essence of the crime of sedition consists in the intention with which the language is used. But this intention must be judged primarily by the language itself. Intention of this purpose is really no more than meaning. When a man is charged in respect of anything he has written or said, the meaning of what he said or wrote must be taken to be his meaning, and that meaning is what his language would be understood to mean by the people to whom it is addressed. In judging articles which are charged as seditious, due allowance should be made for oriental modes of thought and expression, and for high-flown or classical language.¹⁰

"The intention of a speaker, writer or publisher may be inferred from the particular speech, article or letter, or it may be proved from that speech, article or letter considered in conjunction with what such speaker, writer or publisher has said, written or published on another or other occasions. Where it is ascertained that the intention of the speaker, writer or publisher was to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India, it is immaterial whether or not the words spoken, written or published, could have the effect of exciting such feelings of disaffection, and it is immaterial whether the words were true or were false, and, except on the question of punishment, or in a case in which the speaker, writer or publisher is charged with having excited such feelings of disaffection, it is immaterial whether or not the words did in fact excite such feelings of disaffection."¹¹

It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove the intention directly by evidence which in most cases would be impracticable. The law will presume the intention—whether good or bad—from the language and conduct of the accused, and it will be then for him to show that his words were harmless and his motive innocent.¹² Requisite intention cannot be attributed to a person if he was not aware of the contents of the seditious publication.¹³

Strachey, J., has elaborately discussed the circumstances which should be taken into account in judging the intention of the accused. In his charge to the jury in Bal Gangadhar Tilak's case¹⁴ he said: "You will thus see that the whole question is one of the intention of the accused in publishing these articles. Did they intend to excite in the minds of their readers feelings of disaffection or enmity to the Government? Or did they intend merely to excite disapprobation of certain Government measures? Or did they intend to excite no feeling adverse either to the Government or its measures, but only to excite interest in a poem about Shivaji and a historical discussion about his alleged killing of a Mahomedan general? These are the questions which you have to consider. But you may ask, how are we to ascertain whether the intention of the accused was this, that, or the other? How can we tell whether his intention was simply to publish a historical discussion about Shivaji and Atzul Khan, or whether it was to stir up, under that guise, hatred against the Government? There are various ways in which you must approach the question of intention. You must gather the intention as best you can from the language of the articles; and you may also take into consideration, under certain conditions, the other articles that have been put in evidence, such as the articles about the plague and the Diamond Jubilee and so forth. But the first and most important index of the intention of the writer or publisher of a newspaper article is the language of the article itself. What is the intention which the articles themselves convey to your minds? In considering this, you must first ask yourselves what would be the natural and probable effect of reading such articles in the minds of the readers of the Kesari, to whom they were addressed? Read these articles, and ask yourselves how the ordinary readers of the Kesari would probably feel when reading them. Would the feeling produced be one of hatred to the Government, or would it be simply one of interest in a poem and a historical discussion about Shivaji and Afzul Khan and so forth? If you think that the only feelings which such readers would be excited to are feelings of interest in a poem or a historical or ethical discussion, then you may presume that that is all the accused intended to excite. If you think that such readers would naturally and probably be excited to entertain feelings of enmity to the Government, then you will be justified in presuming that the accused intended to excite feelings of enmity or disaffection. As a matter of common sense a man is presumed to intend the natural and ordinary consequences of his acts: he cannot, speaking generally, say: Although this language would have the natural and ordinary effect of exciting feelings of disaffection, I did not when publishing it intend that it should do so. But in considering what sort of effect these articles would be likely to produce, you must have regard to the particular class of persons among whom they were circulated, and to the time and other circumstances in which they were circulated. In judging what would be the natural and ordinary consequences of a publication like this, and what, therefore, was the probable intention of the writer or publisher, I must impress on you, as perhaps the most important point in my summing up, that you must bear in mind the time, the place, the circumstances, and the occasion of the publication. An article which, if published in England, or among highly educated people, would produce no effect at all—such as an article on cow-killing—might, if published among Hindus in India, produce the utmost possible excitement. An article which, if published at a time of profound peace, prosperity and contentment would excite no bad feeling, might, at a time of agitation and unrest, excite intense hatred to the Government. When you are considering the probable effect of a publication upon people's minds, it is essential to consider who the people are. In my opinion, it would be idle and absurd to ask yourselves what would be the effect of these articles upon the minds of persons reading them in a London drawing-room or in the Yatch Club in Bombay; but what you have to consider is their effect, not upon Englishmen or Parsis or even many cultivated and philosophic Hindus, but upon the readers of the Kesari among whom they are circulated and read—Hindus, Marathas, inhabitants of the Deccan and the Konkan. And you have to consider not only how such articles would ordinarily affect the class of persons who subscribed to the Kesari, but the state of things existing at the time, not in the year 1890 or 1891, or 1892 or 1893, or even 1896, but in June 1897, when these articles were disseminated among them. Then you have to look at the standing and the position of the prisoner Tilak. He is a man of influence and importance among the people; he would be in a position to know what effect such articles would probably produce in their minds. Would then the readers of the Kesari at that time, and in the then existing state of the country and of public feeling, regard the articles as a poem and a historical discussion applying no moral to the British Government here and now, or would they be excited by them to feelings of enmity to the Government?

“But in the next place, in judging of the intention of the accused, you must be guided not only by your estimate of the effect of the articles upon the minds of their readers, but also by your common sense, your knowledge of the world, your understanding of the meaning of words, and your experience of the way in which a man writes when he is animated by a particular feeling. Read the articles, and ask yourselves, as men of the world, whether they impress you on the whole as a mere poem and a historical discussion without disloyal purpose, or as attacks on the British Government under the disguise of a poem and historical discussion. It may not be easy to express the difference in words; but the difference in tone and spirit and general drift between a writer who is trying to stir up ill-will and one who is not, is generally unmistakable, whether the writing is a private letter, or a leading article, or a poem, or the report of a discussion. You can form a pretty accurate notion of what a man is driving at, or what he wants to convey, from a perusal of the writing, and can generally tell whether the writing is inspired by good-will or is meant to create ill-will. It is not very difficult to distinguish between the language of hostility and the language of loyalty and good-will or of criticism and comment. You must ask yourselves, having read the articles, whether the writer or publisher is trying to stir up the feelings of his readers against the Government, or is trying to do something altogether different. If the object of a publication is really seditious, it does not matter what form it takes. Disaffection may be excited in a thousand different ways. A poem, an allegory, a drama, a philosophical or historical discussion, may be used for the purpose of exciting disaffection, just as much as direct attacks upon the Government. You have to look through the form and look to the real object : you have to consider whether the form of a poem or discussion is genuine, or whether it has been adopted merely to disguise the real seditious intention of the writer. Again, in judging of the intention of the writer or publisher, you must look at the articles as a whole, giving due weight to every part. It would not be fair to judge of the intention by isolated passages or casual expressions without reference to the context. You must consider each passage in connection with the others and with the general drift of the whole. A journalist is not expected to write with the accuracy and precision of a lawyer or a man of science ; he may do himself injustice by hasty expressions out of keeping with the general character and tendency of the articles. It is this general character and tendency that you must judge the intention by, looking at every passage so far as it throws light upon this."¹⁵

"You must judge the intention having regard to the time at which it was written, the place where it was written, and the whole of the circumstances in which it was written. . . In judging the question of intention of course the language of the article itself is of the utmost importance in enabling you to decide what was the intention of the writer, reading the article as a whole. But you are by no means confined to the language of the article itself. The subsequent articles are also admissible for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the accused. It has been laid down that, provided the words used and the article sought to be introduced were used and published within a time reasonably near to the time of publication of the words which you are seeking to construe, then it is open to the prosecution to put even the subsequent words in evidence for the purpose of enabling the jury, taking the matter as a whole, to come to a conclusion as to what was the intention of the writer. And of course the reason is this. If a man has written something which is expressive of disloyalty or disaffection towards Government upon one occasion, he may very likely make use of similar language on a similar occasion either just before or just after the occasion with which you are concerned ; and therefore if you find that a man who writes an article about which there is a controversy as to whether it is expressive of disloyalty or disaffection or not, has subsequently written something else, which it is contended is expressive of disloyalty or disaffection, that subsequent writing may help you,—taking the wording of the article itself and everything into consideration,—to enable you to come to a conclusion as to what the real intention of the writer was."¹⁶

Jenkins, C. J., in another case, tersely said that to determine whether the intention of the accused was to call into being hostile feelings, the rule that a man must be taken to intend the natural and reasonable consequences of his act must be applied : so that if on reading through the articles the reasonable and natural and probable effect of the articles on the minds of those to whom they are addressed appears to be that feelings of hatred, contempt, or disaffection would be excited towards the Government, then it is justifiable to say that the articles are written with that intent and that they are an attempt to create the feelings against which the law seeks to provide.¹⁷

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have laid down that in judging the question of intent, the publisher must be deemed to intend that which is the natural result of the words used having regard, among other things, to the character and description of that part of the public who are to be expected to read the words.¹⁸ If the natural and probable effect of a speech on the minds of those to whom it is addressed appears to excite hatred and contempt against the Government, it is justifiable to say that the speech was delivered with that intent.¹⁹ "The intentions of men are inferences of reason from their actions where the action can flow but from one motive, and be the reasonable result of but one intention."²⁰

In construing a newspaper article its meaning must be taken from the article as a whole and not from isolated passages.²¹

A single expression that the people of Bengal are trodden under the feet of outsiders used incidentally in a newspaper article, otherwise innocuous, does not constitute the whole seditious.²² In a case of sedition, the accused ought not to be convicted merely upon a few isolated passages or a few hasty or strong expressions in the writing charged as seditious. The main question is the general tendency and effect of the pamphlet.²³

"The speeches must be read as a whole 'in a fair, free and liberal spirit.' In dealing with them, one 'should not pause upon an objectionable sentence here or a strong word there.' They should be dealt with 'in a spirit of freedom' and 'not viewed with an eye of narrow criticism.' The case should be viewed 'in a free, bold, manly, and generous spirit' towards the petitioner."²⁴

If a person chooses to speak in the same publication with two different voices and one of those voices brings him within the reach of the criminal law, it is no excuse for him to say that the other voice expresses his real view.²⁵

The test of seditious libel is this: Was the language used calculated, or was it not, to promote public disorder or physical force or violence in a matter of State.¹ To advise a person to persuade others to adopt violence as a means of attaining a political goal is no less objectionable than advising that person to commit violence himself for that purpose. In either case the advice is to pursue a course of action which is calculated to disturb the tranquillity of the State. A speech which exhorts the audience to attempt to convert the Congress policy of non-violence to one of anarchy is within the mischief contemplated by this section.² Where the accused made a speech at a meeting of the Railway Union and it was clear from the speech that every calamity or evil or misfortune that fell to the country was imputed to the Government, which was also accused of hostility and indifference to the welfare of the people, it was held that the intention of the accused was to bring the Government into hatred, or contempt and excite disaffection towards His Majesty or the Government established by law in British India.³ The question of intention is one of fact.⁴

In a Privy Council appeal from the Gold Coast Colony, it was contended that positive extrinsic evidence of seditious intention was necessary, but the Privy Council held that it is not necessary that there must be some extrinsic evidence of intention outside the words themselves; if the words are seditious by reason of their expression of a seditious intention as defined in the section, the seditious intention appears without any extrinsic evidence.⁵

Innuendo.—If a particular article is charged as being seditious, on the ground that it says more than appears on the face of it, it is the duty of the prosecution to show that it has, in fact, the guilty meaning or intent attributed to it.⁶

to the Government is liable under the section, whether he is the actual author or not.⁷

"It is...not sufficient for a person who has published matter calculated to excite hatred, contempt, or disaffection, to say : 'This is not my own work,' because the adoption of the means, the publishing thereof was in itself his work, and therefore it is, that the printer or publisher of an article, which is open to these objections is always to be held liable...for everything that appears in his paper, the editor, printer, or publisher is as responsible as if he had written the article himself. No doubt the question of his liability to punishment is a matter which has to be seriously considered, and circumstances may considerably mitigate the penalty which has to be imposed. But his liability to conviction under the section is not affected by the circumstance that the publisher who used the words did not originate them. The result of his using the words in his publication is the same whether he had written the article himself, or made use of it in other ways. 'Whoever the composer might be, whosoever wrote or caused it to be written, the person who used it for purposes of exciting disaffection is guilty of an offence under s. 124A'".⁸ The registered printer of a paper is liable to be convicted for a seditious article which appears in it, and cannot escape responsibility on a plea of temporary absence, want of actual knowledge, consent or intention, even if proved.⁹ Section 7 of Act XXV of 1867 makes the printer responsible, whoever may be the writer of the articles in the paper, unless he can prove absence from the office of the paper in good faith and without knowledge that during his absence seditious matter would be published. It is not absence in good faith for the printer to go away, but with full knowledge of what is going to happen in his absence and for the purpose of shirking his liability.¹⁰ But he is not liable for seditious articles published in the newspaper without his knowledge during his bona fide absence.¹¹ Where the editor of a newspaper was convicted and sentenced under this section and the accused made his declaration as printer and publisher thereafter, and continued so to act after the editor had resumed work on release from jail, and further allowed his name to appear as such, though he was absent from the town of publication of the paper when certain seditious articles appeared therein, and engaged during the period in his own private business without taking any interest in the paper, it was held that he had not made out the bona fides of his absence, and was, therefore, legally responsible for the articles.¹² The fact that a seditious article was not written by the editor would not affect the question of his guilt, whatever effect it may have on the question of sentence.¹³

A person, making a statutory declaration under Act XXV of 1867, that he is the printer and publisher of a newspaper, is presumably liable as such printer or publisher but may rebut such presumption. The liability of a proprietor is not governed by the Act and depends upon different considerations. The ground of liability in his case is that he authorized the publication of the incriminating article. The authority may be established by direct proof or as a reasonable inference from all the facts of the case. Under s. 14 of the Evidence Act, it is open to the Court to presume that the proprietor, having the control of the paper, authorizes the publication of the matter which appears in it. Such a presumption may be improper in the case of a large paper, with a separate editor responsible for the selection and publication of the literary matter, but in the case of a petty paper, with no responsible editor and published under the eye of the proprietor, the presumption might be reasonable though it would be open to him to rebut such presumption, by showing that the publication was in fact not authorized by him. Though no authority to publish libellous matter may have been originally given, such authority may be inferred from the conduct of the parties, such as the publication of other libellous matter without any remonstrance or interference from the proprietor when it has come to his knowledge. Other issues of the same paper containing libellous matter are relevant as evidence to prove such authority. Mere absence of the proprietor at the time of the publication of the libel will not rebut such presumption if during such absence he exercises complete control over the paper.¹⁴

In a Bombay case Chandavarkar, J., said : "A declaration, made under s. 4 [of the Press Act, 1867], is intended by the legislature to have a certain effect, namely that of fastening responsibility for the conduct of the press on the person declaring in respect of matters where public interests are involved. Therefore, when a book complained of as seditious or libellous is printed in a press, the Court performing the functions of a jury may presume that the owner had a hand in the printing and was aware of the contents and character of the book. But whether such a presumption is warranted in any individual case must depend upon its own facts and circumstances. The presumption...is not conclusive; it is not one of law but of fact and it is open to the accused to rebut it...The object is to create a sense of responsibility, so that if any public mischief occurs owing to any action or conduct of the press, the law can at once know who must prima facie be held responsible for it...the Courts should be careful to draw no inference of guilt against the declarant from the mere fact of declaration but must consider the surrounding circumstances and probabilities to enable them to arrive at a conclusion whether the declarant had a hand in the printing and publishing so as to bring him within the operation of s. 124A...where the charge is under that section."¹⁵ Knowledge by a printer of the nature of the matter printed is a question to be determined on the particular facts of each case.¹⁶

It is not sufficient for an accused person to say that what was put into his paper of a seditious character was put in during his absence and without his authority. If he did not authorize it, it is for him to prove that as a fact, because it must be within his knowledge whether any such authority was given.¹⁷ Where the accused, who was the proprietor, keeper and printer of a press, was absent from the place when the pamphlet was sent to the press for publication, and there was no evidence to show that he was aware of the contents of the pamphlet, beyond the fact that he was the declared proprietor and keeper of the press, it was held that the requisite intention not having been established he could not be convicted under this section.¹⁸

Every man must be taken to intend the natural consequences of his own deliberate act, and therefore the law will not excuse a journalist or newspaper writer on the ground that he writes for hire merely, or that the commercial interest of his paper required the publication of the writings in question.¹⁹ If the registered owner and proprietor of a publishing house chooses to print and publish a seditious book, the intent to excite disaffection is to be presumed. The position of printers of seditious documents is probably worse than that of the authors, because the seditious acts of the authors would be far less extensive in their operation if it were not for the existence of persons able and willing to print and publish them.²⁰

In the prosecution in England against the printer of the Indian Sociologist the Court, in convicting the printer, said : "If the accused published the libel, there is no distinction in law between what he wrote in it and what any other person wrote in it."²¹

In the case of a manager of a press in which seditious matter is printed, the prosecution must establish by evidence that he had knowledge of such printing.²²

2. 'By words, either spoken or written.'—Recitation of a seditious poem at a meeting amounts to this offence.²³ Disaffection may be excited in a thousand different ways. A poem, an allegory, a drama, a philosophical or historical discussion may be used for the purpose of exciting disaffection, just as much as direct attacks upon the Government. Seditious writing, while it remains in the hands of the author unpublished, will not make him liable. Publication of some kind is necessary.²⁴ The publishing of the life-sketch of a person who was admittedly a member of a society whose avowed object was to overthrow the Government established by law in British India was held to be an offence under this section on the ground that the subject-matter of the publication was likely to bring Government into hatred or contempt or excite disaffection towards it.²⁵

Sending a seditious matter by post addressed to a private individual not by name but by designation as the representative of a large body of students amounts to publication if it is opened by anybody.¹ The sending through the post office of a packet containing a manuscript copy of a seditious publication with a covering letter requesting the addressee to circulate it to others, when the same was intercepted by another person and never reached the addressee, was held to amount to an attempt to commit sedition.²

3. 'Visible representation.'—"A seditious libel does not necessarily consist of written matter, and it may be evidenced by a woodcut or engraving of any kind,"³ or by exhibition of flags.⁴

The accused published a photographic print called "The Nation Personified". The photo portrayed a muscular person styled India Personified (rashtra purusha) standing on the lotus of self-reliance (svavalambana) wearing bracelets labelled self-rule (svarajya) and hail motherland (vande mataram) and holding in his right hand a sword called boycott (bahiskar), and in his left a map of India covered with portraits of Dadabhai Naoroji, Tilak, Paranjpe, Bijapurkar and Khare, who were designated as friends of India (Yar-i-hind) and national luminaries (rashtra dipaka). In the left-hand bottom corner of the photo there were two dogs barking at the rashtra purusha labelled as "Dependants on others" (paravalambee) and near them stood two persons called "Effeminate" (janani). In the left-hand top corner there were portraits of Shivaji, Ramdas, Goddess of India's Independence (Shri Bharat Svatantrata) and Swami Vivekanand. Beneath these portraits were two texts: (1) "He who depended upon others, lost his cause," and (2) "Will the force of injustice (immorality) or physical force prevail"? In the top right-hand corner there were portraits of Chaphekar brothers, Ranade, Chiplunkar, Phadke, Khudiram Bose, Prophulla Chaki, Tatya Topi, Rani of Jhansi and Nana Saheb, some of whom had rebelled against the British Government or had been executed for murder or convicted of sedition. These persons were styled "Reliable Hindu Patriots". The Sessions Judge in convicting the accused of sedition observed: "From the above description of the picture and its meaning it is clear that it is of a seditious nature and would be likely to excite hatred and disaffection to Government in the minds of persons who look at it." The High Court in confirming the conviction said: "The main evidence is really the evidence of the photograph itself, and although some of the photographs therein contained are photographs of gentlemen against whom there is nothing whatever to be said, yet, we think, we must take the photograph as a whole. And so considering it we are clear that its symbolism plainly exhorts to hatred of the established Government. That is made plain throughout the picture, and particularly by the selection as models for imitation of persons who have rebelled against the existing Government or have been executed for murder or convicted of sedition."⁵

The writer of an article may be guilty of sedition, no matter how guardedly he attempts to conceal his real object, but the registered printer and publisher cannot be punished if the concealed object is not established by the evidence on the record.⁶

4. his own will, then that man has attempted to effect the object at which he aimed.⁸ To constitute an attempt all that is necessary is some external act, something tangible and ostensible of which the law can take hold as an act showing progress towards the actual commission of the offence. It does not matter that the progress was interrupted.⁹ It is not necessary in order to bring the case within this section that it should be shown that the attempt was successful. Attempt does not imply success. It is merely trying. Whoever tries to excite, attempts to excite, etc., is held to come within this section. Whether the intention has achieved the result is immaterial. If the accused tried to excite hatred and contempt, the fact that he failed to do so will be no justification for him. That will be a matter to be decided in determining the sentence.¹⁰ If the attempt is made, the accused cannot shelter himself behind the fact that those to whom he may have addressed himself have either been too discreet or too temperate to act upon the obvious meaning of his teaching,¹¹ or that the peaceful circumstances and conditions of the Empire render his act innocuous.¹² Where the accused attempts to rouse the feelings penalised by this section, he is guilty although such feelings may not have been aroused in a single person, for an "attempt" is made an equal basis for conviction as is the real rousing or exciting of these particular feelings.¹³ What is rendered punishable is the intentional attempt, successful or otherwise, to rouse against Government the feelings enumerated in the section and a mere tendency in an article to promote such feeling is not sufficient to justify a conviction.¹⁴

To determine whether an attempt to commit the offence of sedition is committed by the publication of certain articles, it is necessary to determine what is their true meaning, what is the innuendo they convey, and what is the covert meaning, if any, they have. The probable, or natural effect of the words used must then be decided, that is whether they are calculated to bring into hatred or contempt the Government, or excite against it feelings of disloyalty or enmity. If they are so, then it should be considered whether that was not the intention with which the words were used or published. For the purpose of determining whether or not that was the intention, the principle, that a man must be taken prima facie to intend that which is the natural result of his acts under the circumstances and in the particular case in which that act has taken place or occurs, should be applied. In determining whether the intention with which any document is published is or is not seditious, the writer must be deemed to intend the consequence which would naturally follow from his work taking into consideration the time and circumstances of the case.¹⁵

In order to decide whether or not a speech constitutes an attempt to excite hatred, contempt, or disaffection, it should be viewed from the standpoint of the types of persons to whom it was primarily addressed. On the one hand, their limitations, if any, have to be taken into account; on the other, the fact that the words may convey to them a literal meaning must not be lost sight of. The time and the place are also factors which should be considered.¹⁶

Existence of a grievance, real or supposed, is no excuse or answer to an attempt to arouse towards Government feelings of hatred, contempt or disaffection.¹⁷

An attempt to publish sedition is complete as soon as a copy of the newspaper containing it is sold. It is none the less an attempt because something external to the accused happened which prevented a perusal of the article by the buyers or any other member of the public.¹⁸

In cases decided under the old section the expression "attempts to excite, etc." is explained as follows :—

"If a person uses either spoken or written words calculated to create in the minds of the persons to whom they are addressed a disposition not to obey the lawful authority of the Government, or to subvert or resist that authority, if and when occasion should arise, and if he does so with the intention of creating such a disposition in his hearers or readers, he will be guilty of the offence of attempting to excite disaffection within the meaning of the section, though no disturbance is brought about by his words or any feeling of disaffection, in fact, produced by them. It is sufficient for the purposes of the section that the words used are calculated to excite feelings of ill-will against the Government and to hold it up to the hatred and contempt of the people, and that they were used with the intention to create such feeling".¹⁹

An attempt to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government is equivalent to an attempt to produce political hatred of Government as established by law, to excite political discontent, and alienate the people from their allegiance.²⁰

5. 'Hatred or contempt'.—"With the feeling of hatred the law can do nothing because it cannot see into the heart and cannot reform it, but law does step in when any attempt is made to excite that feeling in others".²¹ If the predominant idea of a speech is to bring the Government and their supporters into hatred and contempt and raise hostile feelings against them the section will apply.²²

'Hatred' and 'contempt' towards Government may be created by writings imputing to the Government base, dishonourable, corrupt or malicious motives in the discharge of its duties or by writings unjustly accusing the Government of hostility or indifference to the welfare of the people.²³

An attack on imperialism as a system or a school of opinion without reference to persons does not involve any incitement to hatred or contempt of those who are in the system or hold the opinion. There must be direct and immediate object of inciting violence and the mere talk of armed revolution in Russia or even in India in theoretical terms and the verbal demand for a national Government and a national army to resist the Japanese aggression is anything but an incitement to violence.²⁴

A speech which brings the Government into hatred and contempt cannot be considered to be innocuous because such hatred and contempt cannot be increased from the standard that exists in the mind of the people to whom it is addressed.²⁵ It is quite possible by the abuse of Government officials to make an endeavour to bring into hatred or contempt the Government established by law in British India.¹

The accused in the course of his speech delivered to the tenants of a certain taluka made an attack on its landlords, moneylenders and the Government, saying that the landlords and moneylenders of that taluka were oppressing the peasants, that Government was behind the landlords and moneylenders, and that they could not get rid of the moneylenders and landlords unless they got rid of the Government. It was held that the accused was guilty of sedition as the effect of his speech was to suggest that Government was not looking after the interests of the peasants, but was supporting those who oppressed the peasants, and this brought the Government established by law in British India into hatred or contempt and excited disaffection towards that Government.² An assertion that the British Government was deliberately setting community against community in this country was held to be a statement calculated to incite feelings of hatred and contempt against Government and therefore seditious.³ An attack in a speech upon policeman of a place which does not convey a reflection upon governing authority is not seditious.^{3a}

6. 'Disaffection'.—Explanation 1 says that the word 'disaffection' "includes disloyalty and all feelings of enmity". The expression 'disaffection' is best defined as primarily meaning 'the contrary to affection', and it goes very much towards expressing the same as 'hatred or dislike'. It may cover some thing, perhaps a little different from the expression 'hatred' because it includes 'disloyalty'. To urge people to rise against the Government is tantamount to trying to excite feelings of disloyalty in their minds.⁴ “‘Feelings of enmity’ include ill-will, hostility, feelings of dislike amounting to enmity, and anything of a similar class or character which can be summarised under the expression ‘disloyalty’ and ‘feelings of enmity’”⁵

The following judicial interpretations given to this word should be noted :

1. ‘Disaffection’ means a feeling contrary to affection, in other words, dislike or hatred.⁶

2. It means hatred, enmity, dislike, hostility, contempt, and every form of ill-will to the Government. ‘Disloyalty’ is perhaps the best general term, comprehending every possible form of bad feeling to the Government.⁷

3. [It means] political alienation or discontent, a spirit of disloyalty to the Government or existing authority.⁸

4. It signifies political alienation or discontent, that is to say, a feeling of disloyalty to the Government or existing power, which tends to a disposition not to obey but to resist and attempt to subvert that Government or power. It cannot be construed to mean an absence of or the contrary of affection, or love, that is to say, dislike or hatred.⁹

5. It is a positive political distemper, and not a mere absence or negation of love or good-will. It is a positive feeling of aversion which is akin to disloyalty, a defiant insubordination of authority, or when it is not defiant, it secretly seeks to alienate the people, and weaken the bond of allegiance, and prepossess the minds of the people with avowed or secret animosity to Government, a feeling which tends to bring the Government into hatred or contempt by imputing base or corrupt motives to it, makes men indisposed to obey or support the laws of the realm, and promotes discontent and public disorder.¹⁰

6. It means ‘disloyalty’. Anyone who excites or attempts to excite feelings of hatred, dislike, ill-will, enmity or hostility towards the Government established by law in British India, excites or attempts to excite, feelings of ‘disaffection’.¹¹

7. Disaffection is a feeling, and not the want of a feeling. It is not the absence of affection. It is not indifference, but a positive emotion not necessarily prompting to action, but with a tendency to influence conduct just as all our feelings do. It is not necessarily limited to “feelings of enmity”. It is intended to express a feeling which can only exist between the ruler and the ruled. Feelings of personal affection in such a connection are not demanded, but only such feelings as the relation of the subject to the Government necessarily implies. This relation implies the recognition, on the part of the ruled, of the Government as a Government. The ruler must be accepted as a ruler, and disaffection which is the opposite of that feeling, is the repudiation of that spirit of acceptance of a particular Government as ruler.¹²

When the Bill for amending this section was introduced it was proposed to add the words “or ill-will” at the conclusion of Explanation 1. But the Select Committee thought that the expression “all feelings of ill-will” was too wide and vague. They said : “It is only when feelings of ill-will amount to disloyalty or enmity that they constitute such disaffection as is contemplated by the clause. A certain amount of ill-will may be compatible with genuine loyalty”.¹³ In view of this opinion some of the interpretations given above, notably those of Strachey, J., and Edge, C. J., are not of any authority.

The amount or intensity of disaffection is absolutely immaterial except perhaps in dealing with the question of punishment.¹⁴

8. 'Government established by law in British India'.—This expression means British rule and its representatives as such,—the existing political system as distinguished from any particular set of administrators.¹⁵ The established authority which governs the country and administers its public affairs includes the representatives to whom the task of government is entrusted.¹⁶ It denotes "the person or persons authorized by law to administer Executive Government in any part of British India.... the feelings, which it is the object of s. 124A to prohibit, may be excited towards the Government in a variety of ways;...it is possible to excite such feelings towards the Government by an unfair condemnation of any of its services. Whether in a particular case the condemnation of any service is sufficient to excite any feeling of hatred or contempt or disaffection towards Government by law established in British India, must depend upon the nature of the criticism, the position of the service in the administration and all the other circumstances of that case. It would be a question of fact to be determined in each case with reference to its circumstances".¹⁷ "The expression means, to put it very briefly, British rule in India, as established by the Government of India Act".¹⁸ In this sense the 'Government' includes not only the Government of India but also Local Government.¹⁹ 'Government' does not mean the person or persons for the time being. It means the person or persons collectively, in succession, who are authorized to administer Government for the time being. One particular set of persons may be open to objection, and to assail them and to attack them and excite hatred against them is not necessarily exciting hatred against the Government because they are only individuals, and are not representatives of that abstract conception which is called Government.²⁰ There is a clear distinction between the Government and the individual officers employed under the Government. Words bringing the former into hatred or contempt constitute sedition, but similar words directed against the latter can only infringe the law of libel.²¹ There may be instances of criticism of subordinate officials that would not offend the rule "to bring into hatred or contempt or excite disaffection towards" Government and it is also easy to imagine instances that would. No general rule can be laid down.²² No substantial distinction can be drawn between the "Government established by law in British India" and the "Executive Government".²³

"The Government established by law acts through human agency, and admittedly the Civil Service is its principal agency for the administration of the country in times of peace. Therefore where...you criticise the Civil Service en bloc, the question whether you excite disaffection against the Government or not seems to me a pure question of fact. You do so if the natural effect of your words, infusing hatred of the Civil Service, is also to infuse hatred or contempt of the established Government whose accredited agent the Civil Service is. You avoid doing so if, preferring appropriate language of moderation, you use words which do not naturally excite such hatred of Government. It is....a mere question of fact".²⁴

It is permissible to a writer to dwell upon the foreign origin in the Government of India and confine himself to advocating a larger employment of Indians, so as to make the Government a little less foreign, or eventually get rid of its foreign nature.²⁵

The Calcutta High Court has held that under the Government of India Act, 1935, the Ministers of a Province are not vested with any right to exercise executive authority nor are the officers subordinate to the Governor within the meaning of s. 49(1) of the Act. They are merely the Governor's advisers. The Ministers, therefore, are not "the Government" within the meaning of this section.¹

As to the definition of 'Government', see s. 17, supra. The expression 'established by law in British India' restricts the meaning which this word otherwise has.

Incitement to secure 'Swaraj'.—'Swaraj' does not necessarily mean government of the country to the exclusion of the present Government, but its ordinary acceptance is 'home-rule' under the Government. The incitement of the members of a public meeting to exert themselves to secure 'Swaraj' does not amount to sedition.² This case draws a sharp line between change of Government and a change of form of Government. Advocating 'home-rule' for India is not per se objectionable. But such advocacy must not offend against existing laws.³

Exhortation not to pay taxes.—Exhortation to the people not to pay land revenue and taxes or discouraging recruiting do not amount to sedition.⁴

9. Explanation 1.—Where the Court came to the conclusion that the whole effect of the speech in question was to suggest to the hearers that Government was taking sides against labour and was taking the part of capitalists, it held that to make a charge of gross partiality of that sort against Government was calculated to inspire feelings of enmity and disaffection towards Government.⁵ Where an article in a newspaper expressed that the law was being employed as a weapon of tyranny and that the maker of the law and those responsible for its administration viewed with pleasure executions carried out in pursuance of the law, it was held that the language of the articles came within the purview of this section.⁶

10. Explanations 2 and 3.—Both these Explanations have a strictly defined and limited scope. They have no application whatever unless the article in question criticises "the measures of Government" or "administrative or other action of the Government" and that too "without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection". The object of the Explanations is to protect bona fide criticism of public measures and institutions with a view to their improvement, and to the remedying of grievances and abuses, and to distinguish this from attempts, whether open or disguised, to make the people hate their rulers.

The Select Committee to whom the Bill to amend this section was referred in their Report say: "We have added explanation 3 to make it clear that criticism on the action of Government is not confined to cases in which it is sought to bring about an alteration of what has been done. For example, suppose the Government make an appointment which is considered objectionable. That appointment may be criticised, although the criticism may not have in view the cancellation of the appointment. We have made consequential amendments in explanation 2 to make the language of the two explanations uniform".

Explanations 2 and 3 give perfect freedom to journalists, to publicists, to orators and public speakers to discuss the measures and administrative acts of Government, to disapprove of them, to attack them, and to use forcible and strong language if necessary, and to do everything legitimate and honest in bringing before the public or the Government the fact that their measures or their actions are disapproved by a section of the public or by that particular speaker or journalist. But a publicist, a journalist, or a speaker, has no right to attribute dishonest or immoral motives to Government. Criticism, though harsh and uncompromising, must be free from the taint of language which is likely to arouse or calculated to engender feelings of enmity, hatred, or disloyalty against Government.⁷

The limits to which a public speaker or writer can go in criticising the acts of Government are well summarized by Strachey, J.—"A man may criticise or comment upon any measure or act of the Government, whether legislative or executive, and freely express his opinion upon it. He may discuss the Income Tax Act, the Epidemic Diseases Act, or any military expedition, or the suppression of plague or famine, or the administration of justice. He may express the strongest condemnation of such measures, and he may do so severely, and even unreasonably, perversely and unfairly. So long as he confines himself to that, he will be protected by the explanation. But if he goes beyond that, and, whether in the course of comments upon measures or not, holds up the Government itself to the hatred or contempt of his readers,—as for instance, by attributing to it every sort of evil and misfortune suffered by the people, or dwelling adversely on its foreign origin and character, or imputing to it base motives, or accusing it of hostility or indifference to the welfare of the people,—then he is guilty under the section.”⁸ “Full liberty of the press is preserved to writers and publishers of newspapers to make whatever comments they like and in however strong language expressing disapprobation or disapproval of any measures of the Government, if the object of the disapproval expressed in however strong language is to obtain their alteration by lawful means, that is to say, by arguments or by persuading the general public that those measures are bad ought to be altered. It is one thing to use strong language about measures with a view to secure their alteration. It is quite another thing to use language which does not do that, but does something far different, namely, excites or attempts to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection against the Government. That is the distinction which is drawn. Liberty of the press by all means; say what you like, in whatever language you like, however strong. Condemn measures of Government by all lawful means and argument. But while making use of the liberty of the press, do not transgress the reasonable limit which is imposed for the safety of the Government, that is to say, do not excite or attempt to excite hatred, or contempt or disaffection towards the Government established by law in British India.

“It has been the policy of the Legislature to preserve as far as possible and within all reasonable limits the cherished freedom of the press which has been for generations one of the joys and privileges of the British people in whatever part of the world they have found themselves. Under explanation 3 it is open to any newspaper editor or proprietor to express this disapprobation in whatever language he likes and however strong of any administrative or other action of the Government. It does not matter what is the language used to condemn the administrative or other action of the Government provided he does not overstep the limit on what the safety of the Government depends, the proviso being that he must not excite or attempt to excite hatred or contempt or disaffection.”⁹

Liberty of the press means complete freedom to write and publish without censorship and without restriction, save such as is absolutely necessary for the preservation of society. It might be the province of the press to call attention to the weakness or imbecility of a Government when it was done for the public good. It would also be its duty to complain of a grievance which the public good required to be removed, though the very assertion of a grievance creates discontent to a certain extent. Such writings, though trenching closely upon sedition, should receive the protection of a jury.

Every man is free to write as he thinks fit, but he is responsible to the law for what he writes; he is not, under the pretence of freedom, to invade the rights of the community, or to violate the constitution, or to promote insurrection, or endanger the public peace, or create discontent, or bring justice into contempt, or embarrass its functions. Political writing, when confined within proper and lawful limits, is not only justifiable, but is protected for the public good, and such writings are to be regarded in a free and liberal spirit. A writer may criticise or censure the conduct of the servants of the Crown or the acts of the Government—he can do it freely and liberally, but it must be without malignity, and not imputing corrupt or malicious motives; with the same motives a writer may freely criticise the proceedings of Courts of Justice and of individual Judges—nay, he is invited to do so, and to do so in a free and fair and liberal spirit. The law does not seek to put any narrow construction on the expressions used, and only interferes when plainly and deliberately the limits are passed of frank and candid and honest discussion.¹⁰

"Changes in policy and changes in measures are liable to criticism, and to criticise and urge objections to them is a special right of a free press in a free country . . . every liberty is given to all men to express their opinions, so long as they do not misuse or abuse that power to the injury of others, including among injuries to others, injury to the State."¹¹ Where the object of the speaker was to obtain for Indians an increased and gradually increasing share of political authority and to subject the administration of the country to the control of the people (svarajya) and there was a distinct pleading that the political changes thus advocated should be obtained by lawful and constitutional means, it was held that there was no infringement of the provisions of this section.¹² A criticism of the Simon Commission and reference to the economic drain from India caused by the export of food-stuffs and other raw materials in exchange for which motor-cars, etc., were imported were held not to constitute an offence under this section.¹³

The conditions at present in India are quite different from those which existed in 1897 and far greater freedom is given to the press now than was given in those days and things which may now be said and written with impunity would have been treated as seditious at the end of the last century. The Court is to consider the existing state of the minds of the people and the existing conditions and to decide whether the article is likely to engender feelings of hatred, enmity or disloyalty in the minds of the readers.¹⁴

An article in a newspaper, which is an attack upon the Government and also upon the personnel which constitute the Government, attributing to them a deliberate policy of fomenting communal strifes comes under the purview of this section, as anybody reading the article and believing in the existence of such a policy would naturally both hate the Government and hold it in contempt and be disaffected towards it.¹⁵

A criticism of the acts of the police which represents one of the chief agencies of the Government will fall within the purview of this section if the natural effect of the words used is to infuse hatred or contempt of the Government.¹⁶ But an attack, in a speech upon policemen of a particular place does not convey any reflection on the governing authority.¹⁷ A speech which attributes evil motives to the Government and indulges in a wholesale denunciation is not a mere criticism of the policy of the Government. Where a speaker told the audience that the Government wanted to ruin those people who were trying to set them on the right path, that the Englishmen had come to India to make the people addicted to drink opium and bhang, that the executive and judiciary were partial to white men and exhorted the audience to resolve not to live under Englishmen, it was held that the speech was calculated to excite disaffection against the Government and to bring it into hatred and contempt.¹⁸ It is sedition to say in a public speech that the Government holds the lives of the people of this country as of no value and is prepared to shoot them down under the pretext of acting in the interest of law and order. Where a speaker said that the Government had wounded the feelings of the Sikhs in the matter of Sis Ganja Gurdwara at Delhi and any one could see the grief-provoking picture showing thousands of bullet-marks on the wall of the Gurdwara and that in the name of law and order bullets were showered on the people, it was held that the reference to the Sis Ganja Gurdwara and to the motive of the authorities to rain bullets under the cover of maintaining law and order was undoubtedly such as to bring the Government established by law in British India into hatred and the speaker was guilty of sedition.¹⁹ S made a speech stating that though matters were had under other Kings, who ruled before the British, we were never in a worse plight than now. They have sucked our blood and we do not realize this. Again, whereas in previous days the education was general the present Government has only given education to fit people for clerks and also the handicrafts and trade have been ruined. S also referred to incidents of martial law days. It was held that the speech exceeded the limits of fair comment and brought the speaker within the purview of this section.²⁰ The opinion of a historian may be partial and such partiality is obviously not in itself criminal or even culpable, but there is manifestly a vast difference between this and the deliberate setting out of only one side of the case. A compilation in which authorities are often misquoted, always in the direction of exaggeration or embroidery of the evidence or conclusion stated by the author, and increasing the gravity of the charges made, and depicting nothing but black of any Englishman or any British measure and nothing but white of anybody else, is not a mere 'history' but is deliberately calculated to create disaffection towards British rule.²¹ An attempt to remove from power the ministers in office or any agitation for the repeal of an Act of Parliament is not seditious if no unlawful means are employed. An article which is not an attack on the ministry, but on a proposed bill and the policy of the ministry as revealed therein, is not seditious.²² But a speech which is otherwise seditious does not cease to be seditious merely because the opinions expressed in the speech are in accordance with the principles of a political party (in this case the Congress party) whose members govern in the majority of the provinces in India. A Court cannot take account of the principles of a political party and declare that an offence which is punishable under the Pcnai Code is not an offence because it does not contravene the principles of that party. Moreover it is not the advocacy of certain principles—however extreme they may be—that the law punishes, but the adoption of the methods and modes of address intended to cause disaffection towards Government established by law or to bring Government into hatred or contempt.²³ Shouting objectionable slogans in a public meeting, namely, "destroy the dishonest Government" and "long live bloody revolution" is sedition and comes within the meaning of this section. The speech which amounts to an exhortation to the hearers to join the Communist or Bolshevik party in itself is not objectionable within the meaning of this section.²⁴

To suggest some other form of Government is not necessarily to bring the present Government into hatred or contempt. Hence, a speech alleging the present Government of the country to belong to the capitalist class, drawing attention to the action of Government in banning certain militant class organisations and not banning others which are alleged to be capitalist organisations, describing the effect of such action to be that the capitalist organisations found it easier to put down the workers' movement, alleging the motive of such action to be the common motive of all Governments which is to encourage a reformist movement as a method of checking the revolutionary movement, and, in the sum, recommending the Bolshevik form of Government as preferable to the present capitalist form, does not amount to sedition.²⁵

It is not sedition merely to criticise Government however bitterly or forcibly that may be done. It is not sedition to seek its overthrow by constitutional means in order that another Government, equally constitutional, may be substituted in its place in a constitutional way. It becomes sedition only when the intention or the attempt is to induce people to cease to obey the law and to cease to uphold lawful authority.¹

operate favourably towards capitalists and detrimentally towards them, is protected by the explanation to this section. But not so, if the object of the speaker is to make the labourers feel discontented and dissatisfied with their lot which is attributed to the unfair operations of the prevailing laws and the alien character of the Government which is said to be favourable to the capitalists and prejudicial to the labourers and under whose rule the position of the Burmans is reduced to that of slaves.²

Though it cannot be said that language current in the political controversy of a country can never be made the subject of a charge of sedition for something may turn upon the occasion on which it is used, the context in which it occurs and on the surrounding circumstances of the case, but ordinarily it should be difficult to found a charge of sedition upon ideas, sentiments and expressions which have become part and parcel of normal political life of the country and which do not excite people to disorder.³

Truth.—An article imputing wholesale bribery to the ministerial officers of the law Courts and to the lower officers of the police force, and expressing grave doubts as to whether the Government ever inquire into such abuses, so much is it occupied with investigations of boycott, dacoity and sedition, published when sedition is rife and the minds of people excited, may have the effect of creating a feeling that the Government is not doing its duty, and exceeds the limits of fair comment and is seditious, irrespective of the question of the truth of the allegations.⁴ If certain alleged facts are used as a peg on which to hang seditious comments the truth of the facts does not excuse the seditious commentary.⁵

11. 'Disapprobation.'—This means simply disapproval. It is quite possible to disapprove of a man's sentiments or action and yet to like him.⁶ It is quite possible to like or be loyal to any one, whether an individual or a Government, and at the same time to disapprove strongly of his or its measures. A man may criticise or comment upon any measure or act of the Government, whether legislative or executive, and freely express his opinion upon it. He may express the strongest condemnation of such measures, and he may do so severely, and even unreasonably, perversely and unfairly.⁷

It is not sedition for a writer to describe the Reform scheme as being monstrous and misbegotten, because it is not founded on democratic principles and not a genuine reform or a genuine initiation of constitutional progress, or to assert that some of the police officials and the judiciary are corrupt, unscrupulous and partial, or to state that if an organization which he believes to be lawful is suppressed by proclamation it is arbitrary, and that in such case the responsibility will not rest on him for the madness which crushes down open and legal political activity in order to give a desperate and sulen nation into the hands of fiercely enthusiastic and unscrupulous forces, or to inculcate the doctrine of passive resistance or refusal of co-operation with the Government within legal limits, or to describe the British Courts in India as ruinously expensive.⁸ Where disapprobation of measures of Government is motivated throughout by a desire to excite hatred, contempt and disaffection towards it, it is immaterial to consider whether absolute independence is advised or any form of constitution advocated. Any advocacy regarding change in the form of Government as bringing into hatred or contempt or exciting disaffection towards the present Government comes within the mischief of this section.⁹

It may be pointed out that "what was considered seditious under s. 124A, Indian Penal Code, in 1897 may not necessarily be held to be so in 1932; one cannot shut one's eyes to changes in political conceptions due to the march of events and to the declared objective of the Government of the day."¹⁰

nalía.¹² Persons taking part in any such prohibited performance may be prosecuted and convicted.¹³ A conviction under this Act is no bar to a prosecution under this section.¹⁴

Liability for letters of correspondents.—The editor of a paper is liable for unsigned seditious letters appearing in the paper.¹⁵

Dissemination of seditious matter.—Section 108 of the Criminal Procedure Code can be brought into operation when any person is found to be disseminating seditious matter. It runs as follows :—

“Whenever a Chief Presidency or District Magistrate, or a Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class specially empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf, has information that there is within the limits of his jurisdiction any person who, within or without such limits, either orally or in writing, or in any other manner intentionally disseminates or attempts to disseminate, or in anywise abets the dissemination of,—

(a) any seditious matter, that is to say, any matter the publication of which is punishable under section 124A of the Indian Penal Code, or

(b) any matter the publication of which is punishable under section 153A of the Indian Penal Code, or

(c) any matter concerning a Judge which amounts to criminal intimidation or defamation under the Indian Penal Code, such Magistrate, if in his opinion there is sufficient ground for proceeding, may (in manner hereinafter provided) require such person to show cause why he should not be ordered to execute a bond, with or without sureties, for his good behaviour for such period, not exceeding one year, as the Magistrate thinks fit to fix.

No proceedings shall be taken under this section against the editor, proprietor, printer or publisher of any publication registered under, and edited, printed and published in conformity with, the rules laid down in the Press and Registration of Books Act, 1867, with reference to any matter contained in such publication except by the order or under the authority of...the Provincial Government or some officer empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf.”

Liability for publishing seditious extracts.—The law does not excuse the publication in newspapers of writings which are in themselves seditious libels, merely because they are copied from foreign newspapers as items of news. This will be a matter for the jury in considering the criminal intent; but they must also consider the circumstances under which the writings were copied, the state of the country at the time, the class of persons to whom the newspaper is addressed, the nature of the editorial comments accompanying them, if any, or their absence, if none, the general tone of the other writings in the newspaper, as the intent of the publisher is to be inferred from the natural consequences of his act.¹⁶

Where the accused reproduced in his own paper a seditious article which had already been published in other papers without any prosecutions having been launched with regard to those publications, and it was found that his primary intention in publishing the article was to win over those who were within the Council to readiness to leave it, it was held that the accused was guilty of publishing a seditious article under this section.¹⁷

Republication of seditious articles from another newspaper, one of which only was filed as an exhibit by the prosecution and used in the case against the editor of that paper on his trial for sedition, is not a report of the proceedings of a Court of Justice, and is not justifiable.¹⁸

Where the compiler of certain Hindi Readers, meant for the use of children, collected together seditious utterances and sentiments which had already been published and the cumulative effect of which was to bring into hatred and contempt the Government, it was held that the books could be proscribed even though the originals were not proscribed. A compilation consisting of extracts from various sources may be seditious and a fit subject for an order of proscription, though the extracts considered in relation to their own proper contexts may not be in themselves of a seditious nature.¹⁹

Seditious meeting.—Stephen says : “If a meeting is held for the purpose of speaking seditious words to those who may attend it, those who take part in that design are guilty of a seditious conspiracy, of which the seditious words spoken are an overt act, and their meeting is an unlawful assembly. If at a meeting lawfully convened seditious words are spoken of such a nature as to be likely to produce a breach of the peace, the meeting may become unlawful in all those who speak the words or do anything to help those who speak to produce upon the hearers their natural effect. The speaking of the seditious words is in itself an offence in the speaker, but a mere meeting for the purpose of political discussion is not in itself illegal unless the circumstances under which it is convened or its behaviour when it is convened is such as to produce reasonable fear of a breach of the peace, nor do I think that bare presence at such a meeting as a hearer or spectator makes a man guilty of any offence, though it may expose him to serious consequences if the meeting becomes disorderly and has to be dispersed, for in such a case force may be used against all persons who are present, whether they take part in the unlawful object of the meeting or not.”²⁰

“If one man uses seditious words at a meeting those who stand by and do nothing, although they do not reprobate them, are not guilty of uttering the seditious words. Those even who make a speech themselves are not guilty of uttering seditious words unless you can gather from the language they use that they are endeavouring to assist the other man in carrying out that portion of his speech, and by that course endeavouring to assist him in causing his words which excite to disorder to produce their natural effect upon the people.”²¹

To prevent meetings of a seditious character the Prevention of Seditious Meetings Act is passed. It is set out in full in the Appendix.

Amendment.—The words “or The Crown Representative” were inserted after “Her Majesty” and the words “or British Burma” after “British India” by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937.

In Burma, for “British India” the words “Burma or British India” were substituted by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

The Crown Representative having exclusive jurisdiction over railway lands specified in the Notification No. 26—I B, Political Department, the following modification has been made by a Notification²² issued under the Indian (Foreign Jurisdiction) Order in Council, 1937 :—For “British India or British Burma” read “British India or the Railway lands or British Burma or towards the Ruler of or the Administration established by law in the State in which the said lands are situate.”

PRACTICE

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused spoke or wrote the words, or made the signs or representations, or did some other acts, in question.

(2) That he thereby brought or attempted to bring into hatred or contempt; or excited or attempted to excite disaffection.

(3) That such disaffection was towards His Majesty, or the Government of British India.

Evidence of publication.—If the manuscript of a seditious writing be proved to be in the handwriting of the accused, and it be also proved to have been printed and published, this is evidence to go to the jury that it was published by the accused, although there be no evidence given to show that the printing and publication were by the direction of the accused.²³ In order to establish the fact of publication of seditious matter transmitted through the post office it is not necessary to prove the actual posting, nor that it was printed and published under the directions of the accused. If the seditious writing is shown to be in the handwriting of the accused, and it is further proved that the contents were in fact printed and published, there is sufficient evidence of publication by him.²⁴

Portions of a speech charged as seditious taken down by a reporter are admissible in evidence.²⁵ Short abstracts taken down from a speech are sufficient if they are seditious in character.¹

Upon an indictment against A B and others, for unlawfully meeting together with persons unknown, for the purpose of exciting discontent and disaffection, it was held (A B having presided at this meeting) that resolutions passed at a former meeting assembled a short time before, in a distant place, and at which A B also presided, and the avowed object of which meeting was that of the meeting mentioned in the indictment, were admissible in evidence to show the intention of A B in assembling and attending the meeting in question.²

Intention as gathered from other articles.—Seditious articles published in the same newspaper, not forming the subject of the charges, on which the accused is being tried at the time, are admissible to show the intention of the person, who printed or published the latter.³ Articles not forming the subject of the charge and appearing in other issues of the same paper, are not admissible to show the intention of the writer in the article complained of in the absence of proof of his identity.⁴

Where the prosecution tendered in evidence a copy of a letter purporting to have been written by the accused to the editor of a newspaper sending for publication a portion of a pamphlet charged as seditious, and the letter mentioned the writer's motive in writing the portion sent, it was held that the copy of the letter was relevant under ss. 9 and 14 of the Indian Evidence Act, as evidence of the accused's intention, and was admissible; and that it was not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the letter was sent, before its copy could be admitted.⁵ A writing made subsequently by the accused and found in his possession, though not published, is admissible at his trial for an offence punishable under this section, as a piece of evidence which can be shown to the jury and used in argument.⁶

Intention as gathered from speeches not charged as seditious.—Where certain speeches form the subject-matter of a charge for sedition and when such speeches form part of a series of speeches or lectures on one topic, delivered within a short period of time, any of such speeches or lectures will be admissible, under s. 14 of the Indian Evidence Act, as evidence to prove the intention of the speaker in respect of the speeches which form the subject-matter of the charge.⁷ It is not open to the Court to admit evidence of other speeches alleged to have been made by the accused on other occasions for the purpose of determining the guilt or otherwise of the accused or even for the purpose of determining the sentence to be awarded.⁸

Intention as gathered from written statement of accused.—The written statement filed by the accused in a sedition case does not affect the intention of the accused, which is to be derived from a construction of the speech itself. Nevertheless it is a matter to be taken into consideration, and shows how the accused is minded.⁹

Intention as gathered from preface of book.—In considering whether a book is seditious the preface, though written by a third person, which throws light upon the intention of the writer, cannot be ignored.¹⁰

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session, Chief Presidency Magistrate or District Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class specially empowered.

Trial by Magistrate or Court of Session.—An offence under this section is triable by alternative Courts including a Magistrate of the First Class specially empowered by the local Government, and under the Code the Magistrate has discretion to decide whether the case shall be tried by himself or by the Court of Session. If the discretion is exercised in a judicial manner the High Court will not lightly interfere.¹¹

Where an article alleged to be seditious was written in Tamil and published in a newspaper which had a wide circulation and the question was whether the Presidency Magistrate should himself try the case or should commit it to the High Court to be tried with the aid of a jury, it was held that, in the circumstances of the case, the Magistrate should record the evidence as if it were a preliminary enquiry for ultimately committing the case to the Sessions, if a prima facie case was made out. The Legislature has not directed that the offence of sedition, punishable under this section, should be tried solely by a Court of Session. But there are several circumstances which have to be taken into consideration before deciding the question whether the case is to be tried by the High Court or by the Presidency Magistrate himself. The main considerations in the case are : (i) the advantages of a trial by a High Court with the aid of a jury which would be in a position to know the language and appreciate the significance of the article, its implication and its effect on the general public and the reaction of the readers to it; (ii) the adequacy of the sentence that may be passed by the Court for the offence in question; and (iii) the capacity of the Judge to appreciate the impression that is likely to be formed in the minds of the reading public.¹²

Chapters IV and V of the Code apply to offences punishable under this section.¹³

Special jury.—A trial for sedition before the High Court should ordinarily be before a special jury.¹⁴

Sanction.—Sanction of the Provincial Government or some officer empowered by the Provincial Government is necessary for prosecution under this section.¹⁵ A commitment of the accused upon the evidence recorded before such sanction has been given is illegal.¹⁶ Orders under s. 196 of the Criminal Procedure Code should be expressed with sufficient particularity and with strict adherence to the language of the section. An order purported to accord sanction to prosecute the editor, manager and the printer of a newspaper without specifying their names, and containing a misdescription of the seditious article. On the day of the trial an amended order correcting the errors in the previous order was filed. It was held that the prosecution was rightly instituted.¹⁷ "Section 196 only requires that the complaint should be made upon authority from the Provincial Government and not that the actual complaint must be expressly authorized by the Provincial Government. A complaint is not defective because it does not set out the speeches or alleged seditious words which form the subject-matter of the charge.¹⁸ If the accused is charged under this section and also under s. 153A the charge does not become defective merely because it does not set out what portions of the speech of the accused are within the provisions of this section and what are within those of s. 153A.

It is not necessary that the order of Government sanctioning the prosecution should specify the sections under which the accused is to be tried.¹⁹

Joint trial of printer and publisher.—The printer and the publisher of a seditious writing can be tried jointly.²⁰

Jurisdiction.—The offence is complete either in the district where the author hands over the document for the purpose of being communicated to the public or in the district where it is sent by post for publication and is published.²¹ Sending newspapers by post from the office where they are published to other places constitutes in law publication at the places where they are sent.²²

Confiscation.—A Magistrate can order forfeiture of a newspaper or book containing seditious matter under s. 99A of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Appeal to Privy Council.—Once it appears that the principles of the law of sedition have been rightly understood by the local tribunal, the question whether those principles have been properly applied is so much in the nature of a question of fact and depends so largely upon local conditions that it is difficult for the Board to interfere on this ground with the conclusions arrived at by the Courts in India.²³

Charge.—In a Madras case it has been ruled that a charge of an offence under this section is defective if it does not set out the speeches or passages in speeches alleged to be seditious, but such defect does not vitiate the proceedings in virtue of ss. 225 and 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.²⁴ But in a subsequent case two other Judges of the same High Court have held that if an offence under this section is committed by words spoken, the requirements of the law are satisfied if the charge gives such a description of the words used as is reasonably sufficient to enable the accused to know the matter with which he is charged, i.e., if the charge states the words used with substantial, though not absolute, accuracy; and it is enough if the substance of the words proved to have been used is the same as that of the words set out in the charge. Even if the words or the substance of the words used are not entered at all in the charge, this will be only an irregularity which, under s. 225 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, will not vitiate a conviction unless such omission has misled the accused and occasioned a failure of justice.²⁵ The Lahore High Court has held that the charge should contain the speech or at least the substance of the speech alleged to be seditious, but omission to do so will not vitiate a conviction if it has not prejudiced the accused in the trial of his case.¹

Charges under this section and s. 153A could be joined together.²

The charge should run as follows :—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, by writing (or speaking) the words (mention them) (or by signs or by visible representation, or otherwise) brought (or attempted to bring) into hatred or contempt (or excited or attempted to excite disaffection towards) His Majesty the King-Emperor, (or the Government established by law in British India), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 124A and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

Punishment.—The framers of the Code wished to draw a marked distinction between minor offences and those of a very serious character where transportation would be the only appropriate punishment. The sentence of transportation is not an alternative for imprisonment as in ss. 121 and 122.³

The test as regards sentence should be whether the speech or article was a violent one and whether the intention of the accused was to excite people to commit violence.⁴ Where the accused has made an overt attempt by his speech to persuade the people to rise in active and open rebellion against Government, a severe and deterrent sentence should be imposed.⁵

On the question of sentence the position of printers of seditious documents is probably worse than that of the authors because the seditious acts of the authors would be far less extensive in their operation if it were not for the existence of persons able and willing to print and publish them.⁶

The sentence will depend upon the nature and circumstances of each case, the language used, and the age and position in life of the accused.⁷ A sentence of fine is regarded to be sufficient where the offence is technical.⁸

The theory of punishment is based upon (a) the protection of the public, (b) the prevention of crime and (c) the reformation of the offender. In the case of political offences, arising out of the beliefs of the accused, severe sentences defeat their object. In practice such sentences confirm the offenders in their beliefs and create other offenders, thus increasing the evil and the danger to the public.⁹ Where a paper had not any wide circulation and there were only 750 copies printed of the issue in which the seditious article was published and the editor was a young man of about twenty-two only with not very great education, the sentence of one year was reduced on appeal to one already undergone.¹⁰

COMMENT.

Object.—This section restrains a person from making British India the focus of intrigues and enterprise for the restoration of deposed rulers or other like purposes. And the fulfilment of the obligations of the State to allies and friendly Powers requires that the abetment of such schemes by its subjects whether by furnishing supplies or otherwise should be forbidden.¹¹ The principle of this section is based upon international comity and a desire of the State to remain friendly with its neighbours.¹²

Where a person dwelling in British territory waged war with the Raja of Manipore, a country lying beyond British India, he was punished under this section.¹³

The offences defined in this section and ss. 126 and 127 are similar to those made punishable under the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870,¹⁴ which applies to India. Sections 11 and 12 of that Act are as follows :—

“11. If any person within the limits of Her Majesty’s dominions, and without the licence of Her Majesty,—

Prepares or fits out any naval or military expedition to proceed against the dominions of any friendly state, the following consequences shall ensue :

(1.) Every person engaged in such preparation or fitting out, or assisting therein, or employed in any capacity in such expedition, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the court before which the offender is convicted ; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the Power in question is Asiatic, and in alliance, or at peace, with the King.

(2) That the accused waged war against the Government of such Power; or that the accused abetted or attempted the same.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Sessions.

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is necessary for prosecution under this section.¹⁶

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, waged (or attempted to wage or abetted the waging of) war against the Government of——an Asiatic Power in alliance (or at peace) with the King-Emperor and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 125 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

126. Whoever commits depredation¹, or makes preparations to commit depredation, on the territories of any Power in alliance or at peace with the Queen, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine and to forfeiture of any property used or intended to be used in committing such depredation, or acquired by such depredation.

COMMENT.

The preceding section made punishable the waging of war against any Asiatic Power in alliance with the King-Emperor: this section prevents the commission of depredation or plunder on territories of States at peace with the King-Emperor. It is much wider than the preceding section, for it applies to a Power which may or may not be Asiatic.

The Foreign Enlistment Act¹⁶ punishes any British subject for similar acts. See the notorious case of The Queen v. Jameson.¹⁷

127. Whoever receives any property knowing the same to have been taken in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in sections 125 and 126, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine and to forfeiture of the property so received.

Receiving property taken by war or depredation mentioned in sections 125 and 126.

COMMENT.

The actual depredators taking refuge with their plunder within British territory will not come within this provision. The section applies to those persons who knowingly receive the property obtained by waging war with a Power at peace with the King-Emperor or by committing depredation on its territories. Such persons are punished under this section apart from the fact whether the principal offender has been prosecuted or not, otherwise persons waging war or committing depredation may find a market in British India to sell their spoils.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the property in question was obtained by waging war against any Asiatic Power or by commission of depredation.

(2) That such war or depredation was punishable under s. 125 or s. 126.

(3) That the accused received such property.

(4) That when he so received such property, he knew that it had been obtained as mentioned in (1).

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session.

No sanction is necessary for a prosecution under this section.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, received (specify the property) knowing the same to have been taken in waging war against——an Asiatic Power in alliance (or at peace) with the King-Emperor [or knowing the same to have been taken in the commission of depredation on the territories of——, a Power in alliance (or at peace) with the King-Emperor], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 127 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

128. Whoever, being a public servant¹ and having the custody of any State prisoner² or prisoner of war³, voluntarily⁴ allows such prisoner to escape from any place in which such prisoner is confined, shall be punished with transportation for life, or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Public servant voluntarily allowing prisoner of State or war to escape.

COMMENT.

This section and s. 225A are based on the same principle. In both the sections the public servant who has the custody of the prisoner is punished if he voluntarily allows such prisoner to escape. The only difference between the two sections is that in the former the prisoner is a State prisoner and therefore the punishment is severer, whereas in the latter the prisoner is an ordinary criminal. Thus the offence under this section is an aggravated form of an offence under s. 225.

1. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

2. 'State prisoner'.—A State prisoner is one whose confinement is necessary in order to preserve tranquillity in the territory of any Native State entitled to protection, or the security of the British dominions from foreign hostility or from internal commotion, and who has been confined by the order of the Governor-General in Council.²⁰

3. 'Prisoner of war'.—A prisoner of war is one who in war is taken in arms. Those who are not in arms, or who being in arms submit and surrender themselves, are not to be slain but to be made prisoners. But it seems those only are prisoners of war who are taken in arms.²¹

4. 'Voluntarily'.—See s. 39, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was a public servant.

(2) That he had the person in question in his custody.

(3) That such a person was a State prisoner or prisoner of war.

(4) That the prisoner escaped.

(5) That the accused allowed the prisoner to escape from the place where he was confined.

(6) That the accused did so voluntarily.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session.

Sanction.—Sanction of the Provincial Government or some officer empowered by the Provincial Government is necessary for prosecution under this section.²²

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, being a public servant (mention the office), and as such having the custody of—, a State prisoner (or prisoner of war), on or about the—day of —, at—, voluntarily allowed such prisoner to escape from—, the place in which such prisoner was confined, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 128 of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

129. Whoever, being a public servant¹ and having the custody of any State prisoner or prisoner of war², negligently Public servant negligently suffering such prisoner to escape.

suffers such prisoner to escape from any place of confinement in which such prisoner is confined, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

The offence under this section is like the one under s. 128, with the mitigating circumstance that the escape of the prisoner was not allowed voluntarily but suffered negligently. This section is similar to s. 223 which punishes the escape of an ordinary prisoner under similar circumstances.

1. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

2. 'State prisoner or prisoner of war'.—See s. 128, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was a public servant.

(2) That he had the person in question in his custody.

²¹ M. & M. 107.

²² Criminal Procedure Code, s. 196.

(3) That such person was a State prisoner or prisoner of war.

(4) That the accused suffered such prisoner to escape from the place of confinement.

(5) That the accused did so negligently.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

Sanction.—Sanction of the Provincial Government or some officer empowered by the Provincial Government is required for prosecution under this section.²³

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, being a public servant (mention his office), and as such having the custody of—, a State prisoner (or prisoner of war), on or about the—day of—, at—, negligently suffered such prisoner to escape from any place of confinement in which such prisoner was confined, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 129 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

130. Whoever knowingly aids or assists¹ any State prisoner or prisoner of war in escaping from lawful custody, or rescues or attempts to rescue any such prisoner, or harbours or conceals any such prisoner who has escaped from lawful custody, or offers or attempts to offer any resistance to the recapture of such prisoner shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—A State prisoner or prisoner of war, who is permitted to be at large on his parole within certain limits in British India, is said to escape from lawful custody if he goes beyond the limits within which he is allowed to be at large.

COMMENT.

This section uses words more extensive than those in the two preceding ones which contemplate an escape only from some prison or actual place of custody. Again, under the last two sections the offender is a public servant; under this section, he may be any person.

Scope.—This section is somewhat narrower in scope than s. 129. It requires that the rescue or assistance should be given “knowingly”.

1. ‘Knowingly aids or assists’.—It is essential to show that the accused had a knowledge of the character in which the prisoner is confined, i.e., that he is a prisoner of State or of war.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person in question was a prisoner of State or of war.

(2) That such prisoner was at the time in lawful custody; or

That such prisoner had escaped from lawful custody.

(3) That the accused knew that such person was in lawful custody as a prisoner of State or of war; or

That he knew that such prisoner had escaped therefrom.

(4) That he aided or assisted such prisoner in escaping; or that he rescued such prisoner or attempted to do so; or ²³ Criminal Procedure Code, s. 196.

That he harboured or concealed such prisoner ; or

That such prisoner was about to be recaptured but the accused offered or attempted to offer resistance to such recapture.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, knowingly aided (or assisted, or offered to rescue, or attempted to rescue)——, a State prisoner (or prisoner of war), in escaping from lawful custody (or knowingly harboured or concealed)——, a State prisoner (or prisoner of war) who had escaped from lawful custody [or knowingly offered or attempted to offer resistance to the recapture of——, a State prisoner (or prisoner of war) who had escaped from lawful custody], and thereby committed an offence punishable unders. 130 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

CHAPTER VII.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO THE ARMY, NAVY AND AIR FORCE.

THE authors of the Code say : "A few words will explain the necessity of having some provisions of the nature of those which are contained in this chapter.

"It is obvious that a person who, not being himself subject to military law, exhorts or assists those who are subject to military law to commit gross breaches of discipline, is a proper subject of punishment. But the general law respecting the abetting of offences will not reach such a person ; nor, framed as it is, would it be desirable that it should reach him. It would not reach him, because the military delinquency which he has abetted is not punishable by this Code, and therefore is not, in our legal nomenclature, an offence. Nor is it desirable that the punishment of a person not military, who had abetted a breach of military discipline, should be fixed according to the principles on which we have proceeded in framing the law of abetment. We have provided that the punishment of the abettor of an offence shall be equal or proportional to the punishment of the person who commits that offence ; and this seems to us a sound principle when applied only to the punishments provided by this Code. But the military penal law is, and must necessarily be, far more severe than that under which the body of the people live. The severity of the military penal law can be justified only by reasons drawn from the peculiar habits and duties of soldiers, and from the peculiar relation in which they stand to the Government. The extension of such severity to persons not members of the military profession appears to us altogether unwarrantable. If a person, not military, who abets a breach of military discipline, should be made liable to a punishment regulated, according to our general rules, by the punishment to which such a breach of discipline renders a soldier liable, the whole symmetry of the penal law would be destroyed. He who should induce a soldier to disobey any order of a commanding officer would be liable to be punished more severely than a dacoit, a professional thug, an incendiary, ravisher or a kidnapper. We have attempted in this chapter to provide, in a manner more consistent with the general character of the Code, for the punishment of persons who, not being military, abet military crimes".¹

Calcutta Rule.—Sessions Judges and Magistrates will forward to the Military Department of the Government of India a copy of the conviction and sentence in all cases in which persons serving under the Government of India in that Department are convicted in a Criminal Court.²

It has been brought to the notice of the High Court that Magistrates, in awarding penalties for offences committed by native military pensioners, not infrequently recite their belief that such pensioners will (on conviction) be subjected to an additional penalty, in the shape of loss of pension, and that they take this circumstance into account in deciding on the severity of the sentence passed by them on the offenders. This procedure on the part of Magistrates is incorrect, in so far as it proceeds on the assumption that the pensioners thus convicted must necessarily forfeit their pensions. The attention of all Magistrates is invited to the terms of Article 496, Army Regulations, India, Volume I, Part II, Native Troops, which governs the subject. Under that Article, the Government of India are the sole arbiters on the point whether, in each case, the pension shall or shall not be reduced, or wholly withdrawn, and in considering this point, due weight is given by Government to the sentence actually awarded by the Court in each case. Magistrates should, therefore, not assume that in such cases forfeiture of pension is an invariable consequence of a conviction.³

The attention of all Sessions Judges and Magistrates of the first and second classes in Bengal and Eastern Bengal and Assam is invited to the following order of the Government of India :—

"In the case of a reservist of the Native Army who may be sentenced by a Criminal Court to transportation or imprisonment for any term exceeding three months, a report should be made to the Adjutant-General in India".⁴

Lahore Rule.—Criminal cases against Military officers and soldiers. should only be taken up by District Magistrates or Magistrates of the first class, and this direction should be strictly observed.

2. Cases falling under ss. 154 and 156 of the Army Act, 1881,* should be dealt with by District Magistrates or Magistrates of the first class who are European British subjects and Justices of the Peace, and by no other class or description of Magistrate.

3. In every case in which a military officer or a soldier is sentenced by a Criminal Court to a fine of Rs. 200 or upwards, or to imprisonment otherwise than in default of paying a fine not amounting to Rs. 200, the Court shall send a copy of its final order proprio motu to the immediate superior of the person convicted.

4. Whenever a soldier is committed to jail, whether for trial or under sentence, his military rank shall always be stated in the warrant of commitment, in order that due notice may be given to the military authorities of the day on which, and hour at which, the imprisonment of such person will expire.

5. When a person amenable to Military Law is convicted of any offence by a Cantonment Magistrate, information in the form given below shall be furnished by such Cantonment Magistrate to the superior officer of the person so convicted :—

Form of information.

Name and Military rank of person convicted.	Offence of which convicted.	Sentence.	Date.
---	-----------------------------	-----------	-------

6. On all occasions on which a British soldier may have to be conveyed in custody from one place to another, whether before or after sentence, application should be made to the local Military authorities for a military escort to accompany such prisoners to the jail. The employment of Indian policemen on such duties is strictly prohibited.

7. The annexed extract from a letter from the Secretary to Government, Punjab, pointing out the consequences resulting from a sentence of rigorous imprisonment being passed upon a soldier in His Majesty's service, is published for information and guidance :

Extract (paragraph 2) from a letter No. 3565, dated 30th October 1876, from the Secretary to Government, Punjab, to Registrar, Chief Court, Punjab.—

“(2) The Lieutenant-Governor would be obliged if the Judges of the Chief Court would point out to Magistrates that a sentence of rigorous imprisonment or hard labour, when passed upon a soldier in Her Majesty's service, involves his discharge under Military Regulations, and, consequently, though unintentionally, they may, in passing such a sentence, give a far higher punishment than they in any way intended. This point, the Lieutenant-Governor thinks, should be borne in mind by Magistrates when trying soldiers for petty offences”.

8. Whenever a military pensioner is convicted and sentenced to imprisonment by a Criminal Court, a report, containing information regarding the nature and circumstances of the offence and the amount of imprisonment to which the offender has been sentenced, shall be made at once direct to the Controller of Military Accounts of the division within which the conviction takes place. A similar report should also be made to the Post-Master-General Punjab and North-West Frontier Province, as military pensioners in the Punjab are paid through the agency of the Post Office.

Criminal Courts subordinate to the District Magistrate will report every such case to the District Magistrate, who will forward all such reports of convictions, in his own or subordinate Courts, to the Controller, and to the Postmaster-General, Punjab, and North-West Frontier Province.

9. Whenever a reservist of the Indian Army is sentenced by a Criminal Court to transportation or imprisonment for any term exceeding three months, the facts are to be reported, in the manner described in the last preceding paragraph, without delay to the Adjutant-General in India.

10. The following are the rules for the defence of British and Indian soldiers charged with criminal offences, and prosecuted by Government in Civil Courts :—

1. When soldiers are to be tried by a Civil Court upon any criminal charge, the Brigade Commander should consult the District Magistrate, and arrange with him for the selection and remuneration of a Pleader, Advocate or Barrister, as the importance and necessities of the case may require.

2. The maximum amount that may be paid to the Pleader, Advocate or Barrister is (a) Rs. 100 for each day that he appears in the case before a High Court, or (b) Rs. 50 for each day that he appears in the case before any other Court. These amounts include expenses of every description which counsel may incur.

3. That Brigade Commander is only to appoint a Pleader, Advocate or Barrister in cases where he thinks it desirable. The amount to be paid to counsel must be definitely settled beforehand, subject to the maxima above; an agreement will be made in writing and signed by the Brigade Commander and the Pleader, Advocate or Barrister. If suitable counsel cannot be obtained for the remuneration admissible under these rules, the case should be reported to superior authority with a view to the orders of Government being obtained thereon.

4. When counsel is rightly provided for the defence of a soldier at the first trial in a Civil Court, counsel can also be provided when considered necessary on appeal, subject to the limitations laid down in rules (2) and (3).

5. The term "soldiers" in (1) includes regimental warrant and non-commissioned officers and privates, both British and Indian (except native soldiers on leave and reservists not under training), but it does not include officers nor departmental nor regimental followers.⁵

Amendment.—The words "and Air Force" were added to the title by Act X of 1927.

131. Whoever¹ abets the committing of mutiny² by an officer, soldier, sailor or airman, in the Army,³ Navy⁴ or Air Force⁵ of the Queen,⁶ or attempts to seduce any such officer, soldier, sailor or airman from his allegiance or his duty, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with transportation of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—In this section the words "officer", "soldier", "sailor" and "airman" include any person subject to the Army Act, the Indian Army Act, 1911, the Naval Discipline Act or that Act as modified by the Indian Navy (Discipline) Act, 1934, the Air Force Act or the Indian Air Force Act, 1932, as the case may be.

COMMENT.

The first part of this section relates to the offence of abetting mutiny. The offence contemplated is an abetment which is not followed by actual mutiny, or which, supposing actual mutiny follows, is not the cause of that mutiny.

1. 'Whoever'.—See s. 139, infra. The offender must be a person not subject to the Indian Army Act, 1911.

2. 'Mutiny'.—The offence of mutiny consists in extreme insubordination, as if a soldier resists by force, or if a number of soldiers rise against or oppose their military superiors, such acts proceeding from alleged or pretended grievances of a military nature. Acts of a riotous nature directed against the Governor or civil authorities rather than against military superiors seem also to constitute mutiny.⁶ Mutiny implies collective insubordination or a combination of two or more persons to resist, or to induce others to resist, lawful military authority.⁷ Where P published an article in his newspaper purporting to be a letter from a sympathiser of native soldiers to their address and calculated to seduce soldiers of the Indian Army from their allegiance and their duty to the King-Emperor, and D abetted the same by printing the articles in his press, it was held that P and D were guilty of an offence under this section, and that publishing broadcast some 3,000 copies of the letter was an act amounting to an attempt.⁸

3. 'Army'.—The Indian Army Act of 1911 is a consolidated statute relating to the Government of His Majesty's Indian Forces.

4. 'Navy'.—This includes Indian Marine Service (s. 138A). See the Indian Marine Act (XIV of 1887).

5. 'Air Force'.—The Indian Air Force Act (XIV of 1932) provides for the administration and discipline of the Air Force.

6. 'The Queen'.—See s. 13, supra.

Explanation.—The explanation was added by Act XXVII of 1870, s. 6, and was amended by Act X of 1927. The section is thus extended to non-combatants attached to and serving with the Army, Navy or Air Force. The Army Act,⁹ 1891, applies to the English Army. Act V of 1869 is repealed by the Indian Army Act (VIII of 1911). The substantive offences the abetment of which is punishable under the Code are punishable under the Indian Army Act. For 'sailor' see the Naval Discipline Act;¹⁰ and for 'airman' see the Air Force Act.¹¹

Amendment.—The words "or the Indian Air Force Act, 1932" in the Explanation were added by Act XIV of 1932, and the words "sailor" and "the Naval Discipline Act or that Act as modified by the Indian Navy (Discipline) Act, 1934," by s. 2 and Sch. of Act XXXV of 1934.

In Burma, after the words "Army Act, 1911" the words "the Burma Army Act" were inserted by the Government of Burma (Adaption of Laws) Order, 1937.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person abetted is an officer, etc., of the King's Army, Navy or Air Force.

(2) That the accused abetted him to commit mutiny; or attempted to seduce him from his allegiance.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, abetted the commission of mutiny by—, an officer (or soldier, or sailor, or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the King-Emperor [or attempted to seduce—an officer (or soldier, or sailor, or airman in the Army, or Navy, or Air Force) of the King-Emperor from his allegiance or duty], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 131 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

132. Whichever¹ abets² the committing of mutiny by an officer, soldier, sailor or airman, in the Army, Navy or Air Force of the Queen, shall, if mutiny be committed in consequence of that abetment,³ be punished with death or with transportation for life, or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Abetment of mutiny, if mutiny is committed in consequence thereof.

COMMENT.

This section punishes the abetment of mutiny when mutiny is committed in consequence of that abetment. It therefore prescribes enhanced penalty.

2. 'Abets'.—See s. 107, supra.

3. 'Committed in consequence of that abetment'.—An act or offence is committed in consequence of abetment, when it is committed in consequence of the instigation, or in pursuance of the conspiracy, or with the aid which constitutes the abetment.¹²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the abetment of mutiny as in s. 131.

(2) That mutiny was committed in consequence of such abetment.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not—compoundable—Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, abetted the commission of mutiny by——, an officer (or soldier, or sailor, or airman) in the Army (or Navy, or Air Force) of the King-Emperor and mutiny was committed in consequence of that abetment, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 132 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

133. Whoever¹ abets² an assault³ by an officer, soldier, sailor or airman, in the Army, Navy or Air Force of the Queen,⁴ on any superior officer⁵ being in the execution of his office,⁶ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Abetment of assault by soldier, sailor or airman on his superior officer, when in execution of his office.

COMMENT.

This section is intended to punish persons, who, not being military, abet an assault by an officer, soldier, sailor, or airman on any of his superior officers.

This section punishes abetment of assault which is not committed. The next section punishes similar abetment where the offence is committed.

1. 'Whoever'.—See s. 139, infra. 2. 'Abets'.—See s. 107, supra.

3. 'Assault'.—The assault here meant may probably be that which the Mutiny Acts and Articles of War provide against, namely, the striking a superior officer, or using or offering any violence against him when he is on duty.¹³ As to the definition of 'assault', see s. 351, infra.

4. 'The Queen'.—See s. 13, supra.

5. 'Superior officer'.—These words of course exclude from this provision such assaults as one private soldier may commit on another. But they clearly comprehend all officers whether commissioned or non-commissioned—for a non-commissioned officer is a superior officer in relation to a private soldier, as a Captain is to Subaltern, and the Commanding Officer of a Regiment to all the officers and men under his Command.¹⁴

'Superior officer' in the Indian Army Act includes a warrant officer and a non-commissioned officer; and as regards persons placed under his orders, a warrant officer or non-commissioned officer subject to the Army Act (s. 7 (7)).

6. 'In the execution of his office'.—It is an inseparable part of this offence that the officer should be assaulted while in the execution of his office. An officer is in the execution of his office not only when he is performing a prescribed duty, but also when he is discharging a duty arising out of the exigency of the moment. Thus an officer seeing a soldier out of quarters after hours, or improperly dressed or drunk in the streets of a town, or transgressing any order or usage of the service, would at all times be in the execution of his duty and therefore of his office, in ordering the soldier to his barracks or directing such other measures as might be necessary. It must, however, be remembered that an important ingredient in the soldier's offence is, that he offers violence knowingly to his officer. If he strikes a person whom he or his abettor really does not know to be an officer, the offence of abetment which is here made punishable so severely, has not been committed by the person who abets the blow.¹⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was guilty of acts of abetment.

(2) That the person abetted was an officer, etc., in the King's Army, Navy or Air Force.

(3) That the assault was to be on the superior officer of the person abetted.

(4) That such officer was at the time in the execution of his duty.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, abetted an assault by—an officer (or soldier, or sailor, or airman) in the Army (or Navy, or Air Force) of the King-Emperor on—a superior officer being in the execution of his office, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 133 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

134. Whoever¹ abets² an assault by an officer, soldier, sailor or airman, in the Army, Navy or Air Force of the Queen,³ on any superior officer being in the execution of his office, shall, if such assault⁴ be committed in consequence of that abetment,⁵ be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Abetment of such assault, if the assault is committed.

COMMENT.

This section punishes the abetment of an assault when such assault is committed in consequence of that abetment. It is but an aggravated form of the offence made punishable by the last section. It stands in the same relation to s. 133 just as s. 132 does to s. 131.

1. 'Whoever'.—See s. 139, infra.
2. 'Abets'.—See s. 107, supra.
3. 'Queen'.—See s. 13, supra.
4. 'Assault'.—See s. 351, infra.
5. 'In consequence of that abetment'.—See Explanation to s. 109.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was guilty of acts of abetment.

(2) That the assault was committed.

(3) That it was committed in consequence of the abetment.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, abetted an assault which was committed by—, an officer (or soldier, or sailor, or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the King-Emperor on—a superior officer being in the execution of his office, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 134 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

135. Whoever¹ abets² the desertion³ of any officer, soldier,⁴ sailor or airman, in the Army, Navy or Air Force of the Queen,⁵ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Abetment of desertion of soldier, sailor or airman.

COMMENT.

Offences referred to in this and the next section are also punishable under the Army Act. The section is somewhat ambiguous. It does not say whether the deserter abetted under it must take place or not.

1. 'Whoever'.—See s. 139, infra. 2. 'Abets'.—See s. 107, supra.

3. 'Desertion'.—The offence of desertion from the Army, or Navy or Air Force consists in this, that the officer, soldier, sailor, or airman is unlawfully absent from his duty, and has no intention of returning to it. Whether he departs without leave from his regiment, or, whether, having leave of absence, he overstays his leave, if his intention is not to return to his duty and his regiment, he is a deserter. This intention not to return is essential to desertion, and, without it, the offence becomes one which is known in Military law as "absence without leave", an offence of a much lighter kind.¹⁶

4. 'Soldier'.—The word 'soldier' must be interpreted as in the Explanation to s. 131, supra. The definition of the word 'soldier' given in the Indian Articles of War is expressly confined to those Articles and is a very limited one.¹⁷

5. 'The Queen'.—See s. 13, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person instigated was an officer, etc., in the King's Army, Navy or Air Force.

(2) That the accused instigated such person to desert.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, abetted the desertion of—, an officer (or soldier, or sailor, or airman) in the Army (or Navy, or Air Force) of the King-Emperor, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 135 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

136. Whoever¹, except as hereinafter excepted, knowing or having reason to believe that an officer, soldier, sailor or airman, in the Army, Navy or Air Force of the Queen,² has deserted, harbours³ such officer, soldier, sailor or airman, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Exception.—This provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour is given by a wife to her husband.

COMMENT.

A person harbouring a deserter is an 'accessory after the fact'. The gist of the offence is concealment of a deserter to prevent his apprehension. Exception is made only in the case of a wife. The word 'harbour' is defined in s. 52A.

The offence under this section is also punished by the Indian Army Act, 1911, s. 30.

1. 'Whoever'.—See s. 139, infra. 2. 'The Queen'.—See s. 13, supra.

3. 'Harbours'.—That is, conceals such deserter; or aids or assists him in concealing himself, or aids or assists in his rescue.¹⁸

Cr. L. J. 511.

¹⁸ See the Army Act (1881), 44 & 45 Vic., c. 58, s. 153 (8).

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person in question was an officer, etc., in the King's Army, Navy, or Air Force.

(2) That such person had deserted.

(3) That the accused harboured such person.

(4) That the accused when he so harboured knew or had reason to believe that such person was a deserter.

(5) That the accused was not the wife of such person.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, knowing, or having reason to believe that—, an officer (or soldier, or sailor, or airman) in the Army (or Navy, or Air Force) of the King-Emperor had deserted, harboured such officer (or soldier, or sailor, or airman), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 136 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

137. The master or person in charge of a merchant vessel, on board of which any deserter from the Army, Navy or Air Force of the Queen is concealed, shall, though ignorant of such concealment, be liable to a penalty not exceeding five hundred rupees, if he might have known of such concealment but for some neglect of his duty as such master or person in charge, or but for some want of discipline on board of the vessel.

Deserter concealed on board merchant vessel through negligence of master.

COMMENT.

Under this section the captain of a merchant vessel in which a deserter has concealed himself is punished for his criminal negligence in allowing the deserter to be on board.

The master is liable even though he is ignorant of such concealment.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person in question is a deserter from the King's Army, Navy, or Air Force.

(2) That such deserter was concealed in a merchant vessel.

(3) That the accused was, at the time of such concealment, the master or person in charge of such vessel.

(4) That the accused was guilty of neglect of duty, as such master or person in charge; or was guilty of want of discipline on board.

(5) That such neglect of duty, or want of discipline, was the cause of such concealment.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class—Triable summarily.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That—, a deserter from the Army (or Navy, or Air Force) of the King-Emperor had concealed himself on or about the—day of—, at—, on board— a merchant vessel of which you are the master (or person in charge) through your neglect of duty as such master (or person in charge) [or through your want of discipline on board the said vessel] and that you have thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 137 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

138. Whoever¹ abets² what he knows to be an act of insubordination by an officer, soldier, sailor or airman, in the Army, Navy or Air Force of the Queen,³ shall, if such act of insubordination⁴ be committed in consequence of that abetment, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Abetment of act of insubordination by soldier, sailor or airman.

COMMENT.

This section punishes abetment of an act of insubordination by a soldier, sailor, or airman.

In this section it is expressed as part of the definition of the offence that the abettor knows the quality of the act abetted, that is, he knows it to be an act of insubordination.

1. 'Whoever'.—See s. 139, infra. 2. 'Abets'.—See s. 107, supra.

3. 'The Queen'.—See s. 13, supra.

4. 'Act of insubordination'.—Any wilful breach of discipline on the part of a soldier, sailor, or airman will constitute an act of insubordination. The Army Act of 1881,¹⁹ s. 103, defines what 'insubordination' is. It says:—

"Every person subject to military law who commits any of the following offences; that is to say,

(1.) Being concerned in any quarrel, fray, or disorder, refuses to obey any officer (though of inferior rank) who orders him into arrest, or strikes or uses or offers violence to any such officer; or

(2.) Strikes or uses or offers violence to any person, whether subject to military law or not, in whose custody he is placed, and whether he is or is not his superior officer; or

(3.) Resists an escort whose duty it is to apprehend him or to have him in charge; or

(4.) Being a soldier breaks out of barracks, camp, or quarters, shall on conviction by court-martial be liable, if an officer, to be cashiered, or to suffer such less punishment as is in this Act mentioned, and if a soldier, to suffer imprisonment, or such less punishment as is in this Act mentioned".

The Indian Army Act, 1911, s. 28, the Indian Marine Act (XIV of 1887), s. 19, and the Indian Air Force Act (XIV of 1932), ss. 36-38, also specify the cases of insubordination.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the act was one of insubordination.

(2) That the person guilty of such act was an officer, etc., in the King's Army, Navy, or Air Force.

(3) That the accused abetted such officer in doing such act.

(4) That the accused at the time knew the same to be an act of insubordination.

(5) That such act of insubordination was committed in consequence of such abetment.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class—Triable summarily.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, abetted what you knew to be an act of insubordination by—, an officer (or soldier, or sailor, or airman) in the Army (or Navy, or Air Force) of the King-Emperor and such act of insubordination was committed in consequence of the said abetment, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 138 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

138A. (Application of foregoing sections to the Indian Marine service. Repealed by s. 2 and Sch. of Act XXXV of 1934).

139. No person subject to the Army Act, the Indian Army Act, 1911, the Naval Discipline Act or that Act as modified by the Indian Navy (Discipline) Act, 1934, the Air Force Act or the Indian Air Force Act, 1932, is subject to punishment under this Code for any of the offences defined in this Chapter.

Persons subject to certain Acts.

COMMENT.

The object of this section is to specify definitely that persons subject to military law will not be dealt with under the Code for offences defined in this Chapter.

Amendment.—The words “certain Acts” in the marginal note were substituted for the words “Articles of War” by s. 2 and Sch. I of Act X of 1927.

The words “the Army Act, the Indian Army Act, 1911, the Naval Discipline Act or the Air Force Act” were substituted for the words “any Articles of War for the Army or Navy of the Queen, or for any part of such Army or Navy” by s. 2 and Sch. I of Act X of 1927.

The words “or the Indian Air Force Act, 1932”, were added by Act XIV of 1932. The words “or that Act as modified by the Indian Navy (Discipline) Act, 1934”, were added by s. 2 and Sch. of Act XXXV of 1934.

In Burma, after the words “Army Act, 1911”, the words “the Burma Army Act” were inserted by the Government of Burma (Adaption of Laws) Order, 1937.

140. Whoever, not being a soldier, sailor or airman in the Military, Naval or Air service of the Queen,¹ wears any garb or carries any token resembling any garb or token used by such a soldier, sailor or airman,² with the intention that it may be believed that he is such a soldier, sailor or airman, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Wearing garb or carrying token used by soldier, sailor or airman.

COMMENT.

The gist of the offence herein made penal is the intention of the accused wearing the dress of a soldier, etc., for the purpose of inducing others to believe that he is in service at the present time. Merely wearing a soldier's garb without the specific intention is no offence. Otherwise actors putting on every kind and shade of uniform will be hauled up under this section. Similarly, persons using cast-off uniforms of soldiers will not be liable.

No fraudulent intention is made a part of the definition.

1. ‘The Queen’.—See s. 13, supra.

2. ‘Soldier, etc.’—This section provides punishment for those who personate soldiers, sailors or airmen in the service of the King.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused wore the garb or carried the token in question.

(2) That such garb or token resembled that used by soldiers or sailors or air-men.

(3) That the accused was not a soldier or sailor or airman.

(4) That the accused wore the garb or carried the token with the intention that it might be believed that he was a soldier, etc.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, not being a soldier or sailor or airman in the Military (or Naval or Air) service of the King-Emperor, on or about the——day of——, at——, wore (specify the garb) [or carried——, a token resembling (specify it) (or used by such soldier or sailor or airman)] with the intention that it might be believed that you were such a soldier (or sailor or airman), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 140 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE PUBLIC TRANQUILLITY.

THESE offences hold a middle place between State offences on the one hand, and crimes against person and property on the other. Many of the offences made punishable by other Chapters of the Code involve in their commission a disturbance of the public peace. But the present Chapter punishes especially unlawful assemblies of persons who, whether they assemble tumultuously or otherwise, have a common unlawful purpose in their minds, the execution of which will disturb public order and excite alarm.¹

This Chapter deals with assemblies as a menace to the public peace, in a simple or in an aggravated form (ss. 141, 142, 143, 144), with persistence in such menace (ss. 145, 151), and with actual disturbance of the peace by rioting in a simple form (ss. 146, 147), or an aggravated form (s. 148). It also deals (s. 149) with the responsibility of each member of an unlawful assembly for any offence committed by the members comprising it. The remaining sections deal with connected offences and with offences connected with affrays.²

As to the duty to give information of offences punishable under s. 143, 144, 145, 147, or 148, see the Code of Criminal Procedure, ss. 44 and 45.

As to dispersion of unlawful assemblies, see the Code of Criminal Procedure, Chapter IX.

141. An assembly of five or more¹ persons is designated an Unlawful assem- “unlawful assembly”, if the common object² of the bly. persons composing that assembly is—

*First*³.—To overawe by criminal force, or show of criminal force, the Central or any Provincial Government or Legislature, or any public servant in the exercise of the lawful power of such public servant; or

*Second*⁴.—To resist the execution of any law, or of any legal process; or

*Third*⁵.—To commit any mischief or criminal trespass, or other offence; or

*Fourth*⁶.—By means of criminal force, or show of criminal force, to any person to take or obtain possession of any property or to deprive any person of the enjoyment of a right of way, or of the use of water or other incorporeal right of which he is in possession or enjoyment, or to enforce any right or supposed right; or

*Fifth*⁷.—By means of criminal force, or show of criminal force, to compel any person to do what he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do what he is legally entitled to do.

*Explanation*⁸.—An assembly, which was not unlawful when it assembled, may subsequently become an unlawful assembly.

² Rasul, (1888) P. R. No. 4 of 1889.

142. Whoever, being aware of facts which render any assembly an unlawful assembly, intentionally joins that assembly, or continues⁹ in it, is said to be a member of an unlawful assembly.

Being member of unlawful assembly.

143. Whoever is a member of an unlawful assembly, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Punishment.

COMMENT.

The essence of an offence under s. 143 is the combination of several persons, united in the purpose of committing a criminal offence, and that consensus of purpose is itself an offence distinct from the criminal offence which these persons agree and intend to commit.³ Thus in the case of a house-trespass by members of an unlawful assembly the conviction of the accused under s. 143 is not illegal even though the offence under s. 447 had been compounded.⁴

The intention indicated by the heading of this Chapter is to constitute certain acts, which endanger the public peace, offences against public tranquillity.

Scope of s. 141.—"In construing section 141, regard must be had not only to the general intention deducible from the heading of the chapter, but also to the specific mode in which the Legislature intended to carry out that intention".⁵ The common object of the assembly must be one of the five objects mentioned in the section. Thus, as assembly for the purpose of gambling does not constitute an unlawful assembly.⁶

1. 'Five or more'.—The assembly must consist of five or more persons, having one of the five specified objects as their 'common object'.⁷ Where, of five persons convicted, it was found as regards two of them that there had been no common object, it was held that the conviction of the others could not be maintained, as there must have been five persons who had a common object before there could be an unlawful assembly.⁸ Where more than five persons were charged with being members of an unlawful assembly but only four of them were found to have taken part in the assembly, it was held that none of the accused could be convicted under s. 143.⁹ Where seven persons were put on trial, but five were given the benefit of the doubt, and only two were convicted, it was held that the two could not be convicted under ss. 147 and 323 read with s. 149.¹⁰ Where it is found by the Court that the number of persons who committed an offence under s. 147 was five or more, the acquittal of some of the accused cannot dispel the application of s. 147 to the others. The essential question in such a case is whether the number of persons who took part in the crime was five or more than five. The identity of the persons who were members thereof relates to the determination of the guilt of the individual accused.¹¹

An unlawful assembly according to common law in England is an assembly of three or more persons for purposes forbidden by law.

2. 'Common object'.—The essence of the offence is the common object of the persons forming the assembly. Whether the object is in their minds when they come together, or whether it occurs to them afterwards, is not material. But it is necessary that the object should be common to the persons who compose the assembly, that is, that they should all be aware of it and concur in it. It seems also that there must be some present and immediate purpose of carrying into effect the common object; and that a meeting for deliberation only, and to arrange plans for future action is not an unlawful assembly.¹² Where the members of an assembly merely agree as to what they should individually do, when, in the case of each person separately, a demand is made for the payment of a certain tax, the assembly does not come within the definition of an unlawful assembly.¹³ There is a difference between object and intention, for, though the object of an assembly is common, the intentions of the several members may differ and indeed may be similar only in respect that they are all unlawful.¹⁴ Members of an unlawful assembly may have a community of object only up to a certain point, beyond which they may differ in their objects, and the knowledge possessed by each member of what is likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object will vary, not only according to the information at his command, but also according to the extent to which he shares the community of object.¹⁵

In order to find the common object of an unlawful assembly at the beginning, it is not a legitimate method merely to take all the actual offences committed by it in the course of the riot, and to infer that all these were originally part of its common object, but most normally be based on more evidence than the mere acts themselves.¹⁶

No one is a member of an unlawful assembly unless he is aware of the facts that render that assembly an unlawful one and intentionally joins or continues in it.¹⁷

After people have formed themselves into an unlawful assembly and decided upon their common object, preparation towards that common object is prosecution or following up, and if the preparation happens to be an offence then they are equally liable.¹⁸

3. First clause.—The third clause of s. 121A provides for a conspiracy to overawe the Central Government.

'To overawe'.—A person kept by superior influence in awe, so that he fears to do that which he has a mind and will to do, and which the law empowers him to do, is overawed. But the common object which makes an assembly 'unlawful' is an intent to overawe by criminal force, or by show of criminal force. To carry a conviction under this head the common object of the persons composing the assembly must have been to overawe a public servant; the mere fact that their action did overawe such public servant is not in itself sufficient. A crowd of persons, assembling to see what the police-officers were doing in arresting a person who had escaped from lawful arrests, who do not use force or show of force, does not form an unlawful assembly.¹⁹

As to the definition of 'criminal force', see s. 350; of 'public servant', s. 21.

4. Second clause.—Resistance to some law or legal process connotes some overt act, and mere words, when there is no intention of carrying them into effect, are not sufficient to prove an intention to resist. The conduct of the assembly and the refusal of the members of it to disperse after being ordered to do so constitutes an overt act and establishes a common object to resist the order within the meaning of this clause.²⁰

'Law'.—A notification issued by an executive authority in exercise of a power conferred by statute is as much a part of the law as if it had been incorporated within the body of the statute at the time of its enactment.²¹ When an order is lawfully made under the provisions of a statute, that order is law, and resistance to the execution of that law is an offence under s. 141 (2) of the Code.²²

Under this clause any resistance to the carrying out of the provisions of any law or to the execution of legal process is deemed to be illegal.²³

This clause has not the effect of making an assemblage of persons an unlawful assemblage, if the object with which they assembled was a perfectly legal one.²⁴

Cases.—Resistance to unlawful search.—Where a number of persons resisted an attempt to search a house which was being made by officers, who had not the written order investing them with the power to do so, it was held that the persons resisting the attempted search could not be lawfully convicted under s. 143.²⁵ It was held similarly where the accused, in defence of their property and of their rights, real or supposed, resisted the execution of an order which was made without authority by a Collector, and in so resisting did not use more force than was necessary for the purpose.¹

Resistance to illegal arrest.—Where a party of policemen, on receiving information that certain persons were waiting near a railway line with the intention of robbing a train, arrived at the scene and finding the accused and certain other persons sitting or roaming about near the railway line, attempted to arrest those present and a fight ensued but the accused were eventually secured and taken to the police-station and they were subsequently charged with and convicted of an offence under s. 147, it was held that the police had no justification for attempting to arrest the accused and that consequently in resisting the arrest the accused were not guilty of rioting. The Court said: "The detention and arrest of members of the public are not matters of caprice but are governed by and must be conducted upon certain rules and principles which the law clearly lays down. To arrest persons without any justification is perhaps one of the most serious encroachments upon the liberty of the subject which can well be contemplated."²

Resistance to order under Police Act.—Where the Superintendent of Police issued a notice under s. 30 of the Police Act, prohibiting any processions, associations, or assemblies started or formed by any person or any class of persons within a certain area, otherwise than under a licence, for a period of three months, it was held that if five persons joined or remained in any unlicensed procession, association, or assembly within such area, after it was ordered to disperse, and if such persons were acting together with the common object that the person who had convened the assembly or association or directed or prompted the procession should resist the execution of the Superintendent's order, then each of such five persons would be a member of an unlawful assembly unless he was unaware of the fact that no license had been obtained.³ Where a license had been taken out for a procession but the processionists violated the conditions of the license which prescribed the route and limit up to which the procession was permitted to proceed, and on being directed by the police and the magistrate not to do so, a group of the processionists made a determined effort to break through the police cordon, it was held that the latter clearly constituted an unlawful assembly.⁴

5. Third clause.—This clause specifies only two offences, viz., mischief and criminal trespass, but the words "or other offence" seem to denote that all offences are included though only two are enumerated in a haphazard way. This construction is borne out by the fact that the word "offence" has been given a wider significance in this clause. 'Offence' under this clause means a thing punishable under the Code, or under any special or local law if punishable under such law with imprisonment for a term of six months or upwards, whether with or without fine (s. 40).⁵

As to the definition of 'mischief', see s. 425; of 'criminal trespass', s. 441. Persons driving cattle to the pound are not guilty of the offence of mischief as getting the cattle put into pound is not causing such a change in the situation of property as diminishes its utility or value. An assembly of five or more persons illegally seizing cattle and taking them to the pound cannot constitute an unlawful assembly within the meaning of this section.⁶

An assembly of five or more persons becomes an unlawful assembly if the common object is not to arrest persons who commit an offence but to subject to humiliation persons who intervene on behalf of the offenders.⁷

6. Fourth clause.—The act falling within the purview of this clause is made punishable owing to the injurious consequences which it is likely to cause to the public peace. But this clause does not take away the right of private defence of property which belongs naturally to every man and which has been legalized and justified by the Code. It ought not to affect cl. (2) of s. 105, which allows a person to recover the property carried away by theft. It has no application to a case where a person in lawful possession of any property proposes to use force in order to maintain his possession. The clause speaks of "to take or obtain possession of any property". It does not speak of maintaining possession or resisting an attempt by another to take possession. It has no application to a party who uses force to defend property in his possession. Such a person is not enforcing a right, but preventing a wrong.⁸

This clause is meant to prevent the resort to force in vindication of supposed rights. It makes a distinction between an admitted claim or an ascertained right and a disputed claim.⁹ Though a person may abate a nuisance when his rights have been infringed, a person who has not acquired any right of way or light and whose rights have not been in any way infringed cannot take the law into his own hands and pull down a wall constructed by his neighbour merely to maintain the status quo.¹⁰

'To enforce any right or supposed right'.—This phrase would seem to make a division into (1) rights in actual enjoyment when interfered with; (2) rights claimed though not in actual enjoyment when interfered with.¹¹ The phrase 'to enforce a right' can only apply when the party claiming the right has not possession over the subject of the right, and therein lies the distinction between enforcing a right and maintaining a right.¹² The true import of the phrase relates to an initial act when it is done in furtherance of any right and not to an act when it is done to maintain a position already achieved in the lawful exercise of that right.¹³ A person entitled to the land, but not in possession of it, may take peaceable possession; but if he enters by force in such a manner as to provoke a breach of the peace, then he takes the consequences, because he has no right to take the law in his own hands.¹⁴ Even the assertion of a supposed right, if it is to be asserted by a show of force, is sufficient in itself for constituting an unlawful assembly.¹⁵ Persons who are not animated with the intention to enforce a right, or supposed right, but to maintain undisturbed the actual subsisting enjoyment of a right which is being at the time exercised, do not, in preventing an encroachment, commit an offence under this section.¹⁶ Where five or more persons assembled for maintaining by force or show of force a right which they bona fide believe they possess, and not for enforcing by such force or show of force a right or supposed right of theirs, they do not constitute an unlawful assembly.¹⁷ Thus, a tenant is justified in resisting an illegal distraint.¹⁸ If persons are rightfully in possession of land, and find it necessary to protect themselves from aggression, they are justified in taking precautions and using such force as is necessary to prevent the aggression.¹⁹ There is nothing unlawful on the part of five or more persons in congregating together for exercising a lawful right and resist opposition, if necessary, provided they do not exceed the limits of the right of private defence of their property or person.²⁰ But when a body of men are determined to vindicate their rights, or supposed rights, by unlawful force, and when they engage in a fight with men, who, on the other hand, are equally determined to vindicate by unlawful force their rights or supposed rights, no question of self-defence arises. Neither side is trying to protect itself but each side is trying to get the better of the other.²¹ There is no distinction between forming an assembly to enforce a right or supposed right within the meaning of cl. (4) of s. 141, and forming an assembly forcibly to maintain an existing right, in either case the assembly being an unlawful one.²² The question as to who was in actual occupation just before the occurrence took place is of paramount importance, and a right to possession, or constructive possession, is not generally of much importance.²³ Unless a right of private defence is established, a claim (even bona fide) of title or a claim (even bona fide) of possession will avail nothing.²⁴

"The words... 'to enforce a right or a supposed right' show that it is perfectly immaterial whether the act which one seeks to prevent by use of criminal force or show of criminal force is legal or illegal the test of criminality being the determination to use criminal force and act otherwise than in due course of law so as to threaten the public peace."²⁵ "The natural tendency of the law of all civilized States is to restrict within constantly narrowing limits the right of self help... In the domain of penal law, that right can extend to no cases not expressly defined by the law itself. The fact, therefore, of the illegality of the act of the opponent of the accused is wholly indifferent, unless it brings itself within the category of those in which self-defence is permitted".¹

Even if a party succeeds in taking wrongful possession of premises belonging to another, the latter acts lawfully if he re-takes possession in a peaceable and easy manner such as when he re-enters the premises and puts out articles found there in the trespasser's absence in which case no question of force or show of force or resistance arises as there is no one on the premises; or even when he ejects in a peaceable and easy manner trespassers found on the premises. In the first case, if the trespasser's men come in force after possession has been re-taken and attack the rightful owner's men who do not act aggressively, they constitute an unlawful assembly and no plea of private defence is available to them.²

Cases.—Disputes regarding possession of land.—Where there was a dispute of long-standing between the accused and certain other parties regarding the possession of certain land, and there was no one in undisputed possession of the land in question, and the accused went to sow the land with indigo, accompanied by a body of men armed with clubs and who kept off the opposite party by brandishing their weapons while the land was being sowed, it was held that they were guilty of this offence.³ Where two parties were entitled to joint possession of a property but one party having been out of possession their servants with thirty or forty other men went armed with clubs to take forcible possession of the property and succeeded in getting it without having had to use any force, it was held that the servants were guilty of this offence.⁴ Where the accused, who were found to be in possession of the disputed land, went upon it in a large body armed with clubs, prepared in anticipation of a fight, and were reaping the paddy grown by them, when the complainant's party came up and attempted to cut the same, whereupon a fight ensued and one man was seriously wounded and died subsequently, it was held that the common object was not to enforce a right, but to maintain undisturbed the actual enjoyment of a right, and that the assembly was not, therefore, unlawful.⁵

Procession.—Where the accused assembled and forcibly interrupted a procession upon the ground that it was a nuisance or annoyance to them or their community, it was held that their act clearly fell within clause (4) of s. 141.⁶ A headman and eighteen villagers conducted a funeral procession along a public road with the object of vindicating their right to use the road, and intending to resist obstruction. It was not proved that the party was armed, but some of its members used threatening language. It was held that the use of threats made the funeral party an unlawful assembly.⁷ Where a party goes out armed for the express purpose of having a fight and its object is not so much to conduct a religious procession as to have a fight, the members of the party constitute an unlawful assembly and if they use force or violence, they are guilty of rioting under s. 147 of the Code. But the mere knowledge that a religious procession is going to be opposed by force is not in all cases sufficient to constitute the members of the procession an unlawful assembly.⁸ Where certain Mahomedans assembled together to protest against the action of Hindu processionists in taking a procession through an unlicensed route, it was held that they did not become members of an unlawful assembly at that stage, but when the Hindus were receding back the Mahomedans chased them, then they became members of an unlawful assembly.⁹

Illegal seizure.—Paddy belonging to a society, to which the first accused belonged, was stored in a granary in a street. The treasurer of the society attempted to forcibly take possession of the paddy with his servants, whereupon all the accused resisted him, and maintained the possession of the first accused, some blows being struck. It was held that this offence was committed.¹⁰ Where a large crowd of Hindus appeared in a village and threatened to take away the cows of the Mahomedans which they had collected for sacrifice on the occasion of Bakr-id, it was held that they were guilty of an offence under this section.¹¹

A person purchased a motor bus and paid part of the price immediately and agreed to pay the balance in instalments. He committed default in payment of instalments. Under the agreement the seller company was entitled to recover possession of the bus. While the servants of the purchaser were in peaceful possession of the bus the agents of the company tried to recover possession by use of force. The servants resisted them and when one of the agents picked up the handle of the bus to start it, it provoked the servants and in the course of the altercation that ensued the agents of the company received some injuries. It was held that though the company had a legal right to recover possession through the civil Court, they had no right to recover possession of the bus by the use of force; that the servants of the purchaser did not form an unlawful assembly and that they were legally justified in resisting the attempt of the agents of the company to recover forcible possession of the bus.¹²

Illegal construction of dam.—The complainant's party without the permission of the accused constructed a dam across a pyne exclusively belonging to the accused who had obtained an injunction from the civil Court restraining the complainant's party from interfering with the accused in their use and occupation of the pyne. The accused in attempting to cut the dam were opposed by the complainant's party two of whom were struck by the accused and the accused were convicted of rioting and of causing grievous hurt. It was held that after the civil Court decree and injunction the accused could not be held to be enforcing a right within the meaning of clause (4) of s. 141 and the presence of the complainant's party in opposing the accused was a criminal trespass which entitled the accused to a right of private defence.¹³

Taking water by force.—Where five persons assembled together at a water-head armed with deadly weapons to take water by force and to strike and vanquish anybody who should stand in their way and prevent them from accomplishing their purpose, it was held that they constituted an unlawful assembly and became guilty of rioting when they used their deadly weapons in pursuance of their common object; and that as every one of them knew that the weapons were likely to be used with deadly effect, they were all responsible if any one of them inflicted a fatal injury.¹⁴

Preventing cow sacrifice.—The leaders of the Hindu and Mahomedan communities of a place entered into an agreement by which the Mahomedan community undertook not to sacrifice cows publicly. The Hindus apprehending such sacrifice assembled with deadly weapons and as a result a riot ensued and some Mahomedans died of injuries. It was held that the object of the assembly fell within the purview of this clause and that the members of the assembly could be charged and convicted for being members of an unlawful assembly.¹⁵

7. Fifth clause.—This clause is very comprehensive and applies to all the rights a man can possess, whether they concern the enjoyment of property or not. It differs from the preceding clause in the omission of any reference to a 'right or supposed right'.

The mere use of criminal force or show of criminal force by any person to take possession of any property is not sufficient to bring a case within this clause, unless some criminal intent is proved against the persons so using force or show of force.¹⁶ Where, therefore, a District Board decided to replace a bridge across a khal which was out of repair by means of a road with pipes passing underneath for the flow of water, and the owners of the bed of the khal objected to the laying of the pipes on the ground that it would obstruct the flow of water and removed the pipes placed there by the District Board, it was held that the owners could not be convicted of this offence.¹⁷

8. Explanation.—An assembly which is lawful in its inception may become unlawful by the subsequent acts of its members.¹⁸ It may turn unlawful all of a sudden and without previous concert among its members.¹⁹ But an illegal act of one or two members, not acquiesced in by the others, does not change the character of the assembly.²⁰

An assembly which is lawful in itself does not become unlawful merely because the members know that their assembly would be opposed and a breach of the peace would be committed.²¹ The accused assembled with others for a lawful purpose, and with no intention of carrying it out unlawfully, but with the knowledge that their assembly would be opposed, and with good reason to suppose that a breach of the peace would be committed by those who opposed it. It was held that they could not be convicted of being members of an unlawful assembly.²²

An assembly of persons lawfully exercising their lawful rights would not become an unlawful assembly by repelling an attack made on them by persons who had no right to obstruct them nor by exceeding the lawful use of their right of private defence.²³

An assembly which is not unlawful in its inception does not become an unlawful assembly because of its refusal to obey an order to disperse.²⁴ An assembly does not become unlawful by reason of its lawful acts exciting others to do unlawful acts.²⁵

"No man can foresee at the commencement what course, they, i.e., assemblies will take, or what consequences will ensue. Though cases may occur in which the object of such assemblies is at first defined and moderate they rapidly enlarge their powers of mischief; and from the natural effects of the excitement and ferment inseparable from the collection of multitudes in one mass, the original design is quickly lost sight of, and men hurry on to the commission of crimes, which at their first meeting they had never contemplated. The beginning of tumult is like the letting out of water; if not stopped at first, it becomes difficult to do so afterwards; it rises and increases, until it overwhelms the fairest and the most valuable works of man."²⁶

²⁶ Extract from the charge of Tindal, C. J., to the grand jury of Bristol in 1832.

Section 142.—Section 141 having explained what an unlawful assembly is, this section declares who may be said to be a member of such an assembly. Any one who joins an unlawful assembly or continues in it is a member of such assembly. If he pleads that he was there innocently, or merely as a harmless spectator, he must prove that he was there owing to no fault of his own and that he could not get out of the crowd.² The mere fact that a person applied to be made a member of an association some months before it was declared unlawful cannot by any stretch of imagination be said to be proof of his membership of the association after it had been declared unlawful. Some overt act as a member subsequent to such declaration must be proved.³

R filed a prosecution against K, for enticing away his wife A. K claimed to be the husband of A, and denied the marriage of A with R. On the day of hearing R in company of several others forcibly seized A, put her in the carriage of one H and drove away. It was held that H, the carriage driver, was rightly convicted under s. 147. He must have seen that the object of the unlawful assembly was to carry off A, and when he drove A off against her wish he joined the unlawful assembly and assisted the carrying out of the unlawful object for which it had assembled.⁴

9. 'Continues'.—This word means physical presence as a member of the unlawful assembly, that is to be physically present in the crowd.⁵ Although individuals may in the first instance have associated themselves with a mob from motives perfectly innocent, nevertheless, if the mob is or becomes an unlawful assembly and the individuals in question take part in its proceedings, they will be liable as members of an unlawful assembly.⁶ Where certain persons had assembled to prevent a procession by force from passing over a certain street, and they were ordered by the police to disperse but neglected to do so, it was held that they were guilty of the offence of being members of an unlawful assembly.⁷ Where certain Mahomedans assembled together to protest against the action of Hindu processionists in taking a procession through an unlicensed route, it was held that they did not become members of an unlawful assembly at that stage, but when the Hindus were receding back the Mahomedans chased them, then they became members of an unlawful assembly.⁸

Exercise of lawful rights.—When an attack is made on persons acting in the lawful exercise of their right over property, they are entitled to the right of private defence, and the only question that arises thereafter is whether any member of the party individually exceeded the right. Persons exercising their lawful rights are not members of an unlawful assembly, nor can the assembly become unlawful by their repelling an attack made on them by persons who had no right to obstruct them, nor by exceeding the lawful use of their right of private defence. In such a case each is liable only for his individual acts done in excess of such right.⁹

Amendment.—In s. 141, cl. (1), the words "Central or any Provincial Government or Legislature" were substituted for the words "Legislative or Executive Government of India, or the Government of any Presidency, or any Lieutenant-Governor" by the Government of India (Adaption of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. In Burma, for cl. (1) the following clause was substituted by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937 :—

"First.—To overawe by criminal force, or show of criminal force, the Legislature or the Government or any public servant in the exercise of the lawful power of such public servant; or."

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the assembly in question consisted of five or more persons.

Where, of five persons convicted, it was found as regards two of them that there had been no common object, it was held that the conviction of the others could not be maintained, as there must have been five persons who had a common object before there could be an unlawful assembly and rioting.¹⁰

(2) That the object of the persons so assembled (either at the time it became an assembly, or during the time that it continued to be assembled) was any of the five objects mentioned in s. 141.

(3) That such object was common to the persons assembled.¹¹

It is necessary that the accused should have a reasonably distinct notice of the common object imputed to them and of the manner in which that common object is to be brought within the language of this section.¹²

In order to establish the common intention of an unlawful assembly it is not necessary to prove that its members actually met and conspired to commit an offence, but such an intention can be inferred from the circumstances of the case. In the case of a concerted attack by five or more persons it is a perfectly valid and reasonable inference that they all had a common intention and were, therefore, members of an unlawful assembly.¹³

Where a crowd has dispersed without taking any action, the intention and common object of that crowd can only be inferred from the surrounding circumstances, and among these circumstances the attitude and demeanour of the crowd itself is one of the points which must be taken into consideration.

The opinion or the impression of a witness that it appeared to him from the conduct of a mob that they had appeared for an unlawful purpose is not admissible in evidence to prove the object of the assembly although statements as to what he actually saw and heard are admissible.¹⁴

The essence of the offence is the common unlawful purpose and the accused cannot be convicted if the common object proved is different from the common object in the charge or for which he has been tried.¹⁵

If the common object fails and the substantive charge is disbelieved the accused should be acquitted. It is not proper for an appellate Court, while disbelieving the alleged common object of an unlawful assembly, to find out a different common object regarding which the accused were never called upon to plead nor tried and to affirm the conviction.¹⁶

(4) That the accused joined, or continued in, such assembly.

It is sufficient for the offence of riot to be proved against an individual that that individual should remain in an unlawful assembly as soon as he is aware that the assembly is unlawful.¹⁷

(5) That he did so intentionally.

(6) That he did so being aware of the above facts.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

Power to disperse unlawful assembly.—Chapter IX of the Code of Criminal Procedure gives power to a Magistrate to disperse unlawful assemblies by using civil or military force.¹⁸

Joint trial.—As a matter of procedure it is irregular to treat both parties to a riot as constituting one unlawful assembly, and to try them together inasmuch as they do not have one common object.¹⁹ Members of each faction may be called as witnesses against their opponents.²⁰ Where members of two assemblies do not mingle together at any time or place, the mere fact that they have a common intention will not make them one assembly. form one assembly is a question of fact in each case. Where two mobs start from different localities and operate independently and never come close to each other, they cannot be considered to be members of one assembly, though their object be the same.²¹

Restoration of possession can be ordered.—Where possession of immovable property is taken by means of criminal trespass and threats to use force against the complainant by an unlawful assembly, the Magistrate can make an order directing restoration of possession.²²

Death of complainant.—The death of the complainant does not put an end to the prosecution. The trying Magistrate has a discretion in proper cases to allow the complaint to continue by a proper and fit complainant if the latter is willing.²³

Right of Crown to prosecute.—A complaint for rioting or for being a member of an unlawful assembly discloses a non-compoundable offence or which the Crown alone in the interests of public peace and security has a right to prosecute, and a complainant has no independent right to have the guilty persons punished.²⁴

Charge.—The charge should state the common object of the assembly.²⁵ Omission to state it does not vitiate a conviction if there is evidence on the record to show it.¹ It is sufficient if it is specified in the complaint and found by the Court.² Such an omission is a mere irregularity which will vitiate the trial only if it has caused miscarriage of justice on the merits; and the test of such a miscarriage is whether the accused were prejudiced by the omission and had no notice during the trial of the case of the prosecution as to the common object so as to enable them to meet it in their defence and in cross-examination.³

Where the offence alleged to have been committed by the members of an unlawful assembly in furtherance of their common object is hurt, whether simple or grievous, it is sufficient to state in the charge that the common object of the members of the unlawful assembly was to assault the persons to whom hurt was caused. It is not necessary to state that the common object was to cause simple or grievous hurt, as the case may be.⁴

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, were a member of an unlawful assembly, the common object of which was (specify the object), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 143 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

144. Whoever, being armed with any deadly weapon, or with anything which, used as a weapon of offence,¹ is likely to cause death, is a member of an unlawful assembly, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Joining unlawful
with deadly weapon.

COMMENT.

The risk to the public tranquillity is aggravated by the intention to use force evinced by carrying arms. This section, therefore, provides for an enhanced punishment where a member of an unlawful assembly is armed with a deadly weapon.

Scope.—The enhanced punishment under the section can only be inflicted on that member of an unlawful assembly who uses a weapon of offence. The word 'whoever' justifies this interpretation.

1. 'Weapon of offence'.—That is, a weapon which under the present circumstances and at the present time (during the existence of the unlawful assembly) is an offensive weapon, notwithstanding that it might be otherwise at a different time and place.⁵ A crowd of about 100 persons, including the accused, had assembled together, armed with bill hooks and sticks, but it dispersed at once on seeing the police. On these facts the Magistrate assumed that the intention of the members of the crowd was to use criminal force, and, having regard to the weapons with which they were armed, he convicted them under this section. The High Court held that the prosecution had failed to show that the common object of the crowd was such as would constitute it an unlawful assembly as defined by s. 141, and that the accused were entitled to be acquitted.⁶

Sections 114 and 144.—When one person instigates another to join an unlawful assembly armed with a deadly weapon and afterwards joins the unlawful assembly himself he is punishable under this section, read with s. 114, even though he was not himself armed with a deadly weapon⁷.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1) to (6) as in s. 143; and further

(7) That the accused was armed with a deadly weapon, or with anything which, used as a weapon of offence, was likely to cause death.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Any Magistrate.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, being armed with a deadly weapon, to wit, [or armed with something which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, to wit—] were a member of an unlawful assembly, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 144 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

145. Whoever joins or continues in an unlawful assembly, knowing that such unlawful assembly has been commanded in the manner prescribed by law to disperse¹ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine,

Joining or continuing in unlawful assembly, knowing it has been commanded to disperse. or with both.

COMMENT.

This section and s. 151 are connected with each other so far as the principle underlying both of them is concerned. Section 127(I) of the Code of Criminal Procedure says: "Any Magistrate or officer in charge of a police-station may command any unlawful assembly, or any assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, to disperse; and it shall thereupon be the duty of the members of such assembly to disperse accordingly."

~~Section~~ Section 188 of the Penal Code provides for the disobedience of any lawful order promulgated by a public servant. This section and s. 151 deal with special cases as the disobedience may cause serious breach of the peace.

1. 'Commanded in the manner prescribed by law to disperse'.—This expression means, in the city of Bombay, commanded as prescribed in s. 40 (I) of the City of Bombay Police Act, 1902. It cannot be construed in a wider sense so as to include a command by a Magistrate to disperse without any order having been given by an officer in charge of a police-station.⁸ In disobedience of an order passed under s. 42 of the Bombay District Police Act, the accused along with others formed themselves into a procession (Prabhat Pheri) and passed through the streets uttering objectionable songs, in spite of the advice of police officers and others that they were violating the order. The assembly was declared unlawful and was ordered to disperse. The crowd refused to disperse and squatted on the public road. On a prosecution of the accused for an offence punishable under this section, it was held that the common object of the unlawful assembly having been to commit an offence under the latter part of s. 188, the assembly became unlawful, and the remaining in it after it was ordered to disperse constituted an offence under this section.⁹

CASE.

The accused formed into a procession which started from a Congress office. When they reached a certain place they were met by a party of police officers who directed them to proceed by a route different from that which they were till then following. They thereupon sat down on the ground in the public road. They were asked to disperse but refused to do so and were arrested and convicted under s. 151 and this section. It was held that the conduct of the processionists in sitting on the ground when ordered to take a different route and refusing to disperse when called upon to do so, coupled with the fact that the conduct of the accused proved that the procession was animated by hostility to the established Government, justified the finding that the processionists were determined to disregard and disobey any lawful orders that the police or the Magistrate might give them and that their object was therefore unlawful. It was also held that, though the sentences were heavy in the circumstances of the case, the High Court would not entertain an application for reduction of sentence at the instance of a third party, the convicted persons not having seen fit to appeal.¹⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1) to (6) as in s. 143; and further

(7) That such unlawful assembly had been commanded to disperse.

(8) That such command to disperse was in the manner prescribed by law.

(9) That the accused joined, or continued in such unlawful assembly after it had been commanded to disperse.

(10) That the accused did so, knowing that it had been commanded to disperse.¹¹

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Any Magistrate.

The prosecution should give formal evidence to show that the accused had the common object to resist the execution of a lawful order and the accused should have an opportunity to meet the case in the trial Court, particularly when the charge framed against him does not mention that common object.¹²

Charge.—The failure to specify the common object in a charge under this section is not fatal to the trial if it can be shown that there was ample evidence on the record to prove what the common object of the assembly was.¹³

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, joined (or continued in) an unlawful assembly, knowing that such assembly had been commanded in the manner prescribed by law to disperse, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 145 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

146. Whenever force or violence is used by an unlawful assembly, or by any member thereof,¹ in prosecution of the common object² of such assembly, every member of such assembly is guilty of the offence of rioting.

147. Whoever is guilty of rioting, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

The basis of the law as to rioting is the definition of an unlawful assembly, a riot being simply an unlawful assembly in a particular state of activity,¹⁴ that activity being accompanied by the use of force or violence. It is only the use of force that distinguishes rioting from an unlawful assembly.

Ingredients.—There are two essentials which make every member of an unlawful assembly guilty of rioting—

1. Use of force or violence by an unlawful assembly or by any member thereof.
2. Such force or violence should have been used in prosecution of the common object of such assembly.

1. 'Force or violence...used by an unlawful assembly, or by any member thereof'.—As to the meaning of 'force', see s. 349. It is not necessary that the force or violence should be directed against any particular person or object.¹⁵ The use of any force, even though it be of the slightest possible character, by any one of an assembly once established as unlawful constitutes rioting.¹⁶ A person who is the leader of an unlawful assembly whose common object is to assault passers-by commits the offence of rioting.¹⁷ Thus, if a husband and his friends take possession of his wife by force and violence they are guilty of rioting.¹⁸ Actual use of force and not merely a show of force, is necessary. Where a number of men who are assembled at a certain place run away on being attacked by the opposite party, they are not guilty of rioting.¹⁹

'Violence'.—This word is not restricted to force used against persons only but it extends also to force used against inanimate objects.²⁰ Thus, if an unlawful assembly came together for the purpose of pulling down a man's house, and proceeded to carry out the object, they could be said to have used violence. Similarly, where the accused struck at the door of the complainant who fled away to save himself from being beaten, it was held that they had used violence.²¹ Pulling down a toddy shop and cutting and destroying spatts of toddy trees are enough to show that violence was used.²² Applying lighted match to a hayrick or burning a cattle-shed amounts to using violence.²³ Looting of a cutlery (office) demolishing a privy and erecting fence on the land of other party are acts of violence.²⁴

'Unlawful assembly'.—See s. 141, supra.

'Any member thereof'.—Whether only one, or more than one of the persons assembled use force, the penal consequences apply equally to all. It will be otherwise, however, if the force or violence is used for a distinct purpose...as if it consists of a mere affray or assault upon each other, or upon bystanders by some members of the assembly.²⁵ If any person encourages, or promotes, or takes part in, riots, whether by words, signs, or gestures, or by wearing the badge or ensign of the rioters, he is himself considered a rioter. Active participation in actual violence is not necessary.

Some may encourage by words, others by signs, and others again may actually cause hurt and yet all would be equally guilty of rioting.¹

2. 'In prosecution of the common object'.—Section 141 indicates what objects are deemed unlawful. If the common object of an assembly is not illegal, it is not rioting if force is used by any member of that assembly.² If the common object is not unlawful then there can be no unlawful assembly and consequently no rioting. Thus, resistance to the execution of an illegal warrant within reasonable bounds does not amount to rioting because the common object is not unlawful; but when the right of resistance is exceeded and a severe injury, not called for, is inflicted, the person who inflicts such injury may be convicted of grievous hurt.³ Similarly, resistance to a search without a search-warrant does not amount to rioting.⁴ Where a warrant of attachment was signed, not by the Munsiff, but by the Sheristadar, and did not bear the seal of the Court, and the accused were charged with rioting with the common object of illegally rescuing the attached property, it was held that the omission of the seal rendered the attachment illegal, and that, therefore, the common object charged was not an unlawful common object and consequently the charge of rioting was not sustainable.⁵ Although in ascertaining whether the object of the members composing an assembly is such as to constitute an unlawful assembly, all the circumstances must be regarded which tend to show what that object is, and the result of such consideration may be to negative the view that the object is such as to render the assembly unlawful, still when once the offence of rioting or any other offence is brought home to a member of an unlawful assembly, it rests with him to establish that the apparent offence is no offence, by reason of the act which constitutes the offence being justifiable under the provisions relating to the right of private defence.⁶

Acts done by some members of an unlawful assembly outside the common object of the assembly or of such a nature as the members of the assembly could not have known to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object are only chargeable against the actual perpetrators of those acts.⁷

Sudden quarrel.—If a number of persons assembled for any lawful purpose suddenly quarrel without any previous intention or design, they do not commit a riot in the legal sense of the word.⁸ Similarly, if a fight were to spring up between two of the persons unlawfully assembled, this would only make them individually responsible, and not convert the assembly into a riot.⁹ It is, however, not necessary that there should be a common object prior to the commencement of the fight. It is also immaterial that the accused conceived the idea of injuring suddenly after they went to the scene of offence.¹⁰

Forcible entry.—A plea of right to possession is no answer to a charge of rioting by making a forcible entry on land cultivated by a trespasser, who is in possession and opposes the entry.¹¹ A person does not lose possession of a field by going home to have a meal, or to sleep. If somebody enters on his land during his absence and he does not acquiesce in the trespass, he would still retain possession of the land; and as the possessor of the land he is entitled to defend that possession. If he brings friends with him and with force of arms resists those who are trespassing on the land who are also armed, he and his friends would not be guilty of forming themselves into an unlawful assembly; for those who defend their possession are not members of an unlawful assembly. If a person acquiesces in his dispossession and subsequently under claim of title comes again to dispossess his opponents, then he and his friends would be members of an unlawful assembly and guilty of rioting.¹²

Private defence.—Where a party acts in the exercise of the right of private defence, there is no riot, and if the accused are able to establish that they acted in the right of private defence, the burden of proving that they exceeded it lies upon the prosecution.¹³ An assembly which has the common object of inflicting hurt upon any other person or body of persons is prima facie unlawful.

There can be no right of private defence where the riot is premeditated on both sides.¹⁴ Where both parties are armed and prepared to fight, it is immaterial who is the first to attack, unless it is shown that a particular party was acting within the legal limits of the right of private defence.¹⁵ A free fight is one when both sides mean to fight from the start, go out to fight and there is a pitched battle. The question of who attacks and who defends in such a fight is wholly immaterial and depends on the tactics adopted by the rival commanders. The fact that the accused's party were victorious does not lead to any inference that they were the aggressors.¹⁶

The illegality of a certain act or acts opposed by criminal force is no defence to a charge of rioting, unless the circumstances are such that a right of self-defence arises.¹⁷

If the common object of an assembly is to enforce the right or supposed right of private defence of person or property, and force is used in prosecution of the common object to enforce that right by means of criminal force, or show of such force, rioting is committed, within the terms of the law, unless circumstances exist which give occasion for the exercise of the right of private defence and this right is exercised within the limits prescribed by law.¹⁸

The party of the accused accompanied by R went armed with clubs to fish in a tank in which R had a two-annas share. The complainant, who with some other co-sharers, represented an eleven-annas interest in the tank, went there with some of these co-sharers to protest on the ground that the accused had no share or interest in the tank. A fight ensued in the course of which some of the complainant's party received slight injuries. It was held that the accused were guilty of rioting and voluntarily causing hurt.¹⁹ The accused went with three ploughs on land to which the complainant had the right of possession, and of which he was in possession till such entry, and began to plough up the land, to uproot some castor plants, and to throw them away. While they were thus in actual but temporary occupation, the complainant and his party went on the land and tried to unyoke the cattle, whereupon a riot took place. It was held that the accused were guilty of rioting and that their action in beating the complainant's party was not justified by the fact of their having obtained temporary occupation.²⁰ Where more than twenty-five persons went in a body to enforce the right or supposed right of one of them to an animal by removing it from the house of a third person, and after they had removed it and gone some distance they were followed by that person, who was consequently attacked and beaten by some of them and died as a result of a blow on the head, it was held that the assembly was an unlawful assembly.²¹

The accused, on receiving information that the complainant's party were about to take forcible possession of a plot of land, which was found by the Court to be in the possession of the accused, collected a large number of men, some of whom were armed, and went through the village to the land in question. While they were engaged in ploughing, the complainant's party came up and interfered with the ploughing. A fight ensued, in the course of which one of the complainant's party was grievously wounded and subsequently died, and two of the accused's party were hurt. It was held that the accused were justified in taking such precautions as they thought were required to prevent the aggression, and that they could not be held to be members of an unlawful assembly.²² Where the accused were maintained in possession of certain lands, including a homestead, under s. 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and the opposite party unlawfully attempted to take possession of some huts standing thereon, whereupon the accused came with an armed body and demolished the huts, and on being resisted by the opposite party wounded some of them, it was held by the majority of the Court that they were justified in taking precautions and using such force as was necessary to prevent aggression by the opposite party.²³

Where one K being assaulted by B, a number of persons rushed to the scene and a fracas occurred in which B was killed, and K and the other persons forming the assembly were convicted of rioting, it was held that they were not guilty of rioting as the common object of the crowd was to rescue K and not to assault B.²⁴ In so far as excessive force is used by some members of the assembly the users of such force alone are liable to be punished for the assaults committed by them and not the other members of the assembly and in the absence of proof as to who actually dealt the fatal blow to the original assailant, no member of the assembly is punishable in respect of the blow.²⁵

Delivery of possession by the Court passes possession to the party and must be treated as doing so even though the other side may allege the delivery of possession to be of doubtful legality.¹ But in a Nagpur case only symbolical possession of fields was given to the auction-purchasers and they were resisted by the previous owners' lessee whose crops were standing, when they tried to take actual possession, and it was held that no offence was committed by the lessee and his men, and their conviction for rioting was bad.²

CASES.

Resistance to distraint.—Where a landlord, who had not tendered to his tenant such a lease as the latter was bound to accept under the Madras Rent Recovery Act (Mad. Act VIII of 1865), distrained his cattle for arrears of rent, the assistance of the police having been procured for the purpose, and the tenant with others forcibly obstructed the removal of the cattle, it was held that they were guilty of rioting.³ But obstruction offered to distraint by a landlord when no rent was in arrear was held to be no offence.⁴

Resistance to public officer.—N, S and G were appointed special constables under s. 17 of the Police Act, 1861. A Police Inspector accompanied by some police went to their village and informed them that they had been so appointed, and requested them to accompany him to a police-station which they declined to do. The Inspector then had N arrested, whereupon N shook himself free, and N, S and G with other persons, who had assembled, abused and threatened the police and compelled them to withdraw from the village. It was held that the refusal of N to accompany the Inspector was not an offence for which N could be arrested, and, as the police when obstructed were not acting in lawful discharge of their duty, none of the persons concerned could be convicted of an offence under s. 353, but they were guilty of rioting under this section.⁵

Where a Sub-Inspector of Police, on receiving information of the commission of a dacoity, searched the house of one of the alleged offenders, accompanied by the complainant and the village officers, but without a search warrant, whereupon they were beaten by the accused who were charged with, and convicted of, rioting, with the common object of resisting the search, assault and causing hurt, under ss. 147, 323 and

353; it was held that the search was illegal, and that, the common object having failed, the conviction under this section was bad.⁶ But where certain police-officers acting bona fide under a defective search warrant were resisted by more than five persons and hurt was caused, the former Chief Court of the Punjab held that they were guilty of an offence under this section read with s. 99 if the common object was to cause hurt and hurt was caused.⁷ A complaint having been lodged against two persons under s. 498 for abduction of K, the complainant's daughter-in-law, the Magistrate ordered the issue of a warrant for the arrest of K, apparently intending to act under s. 90 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, but the warrant erroneously charged K herself with an offence under s. 498. Under this warrant the head constable arrested K and had taken her to a distance of about 200 kadams (steps) when a large concourse of people assembled, amongst whom were the accused, who took away the woman from the custody of the head constable and the constables with him, and inflicted certain injuries upon them. It was held that the accused were rightly convicted of an offence of rioting.⁸ Where the accused by using criminal force attempted to rescue certain persons who were arrested by the police, it was held that they were guilty of rioting.⁹ Where the accused, a section of villagers, broke into the village temple and removed idols for celebrating a festival, it was held that they were guilty of rioting as their object was to enforce a right by means of criminal force and they used violence in prosecution of the common object.¹⁰

Preventing cow-killing.—Where several Hindus, acting in concert, forcibly removed an ox and two cows from the possession of a Mahomedan, not for the purpose of causing 'wrongful gain' to themselves or 'wrongful loss' to the owner of the cattle, but for the purpose of preventing the killing of the cows, it was held that they were guilty not of dacoity but of rioting.¹¹ But the authority of this case has been shaken by a subsequent decision of the same High Court. In the later case a large body of Hindus, acting in concert, and apparently under the influence of a religious feeling, attacked certain Mahomedans who were driving cattle along a public road and forcibly deprived them of the possession of such cattle under circumstances which did not indicate any intention of subsequently restoring such cattle to their lawful owners. It was held that the offence of which the Hindus were guilty was dacoity and not merely rioting.¹²

Recovering possession of cattle.—Persons whose common object was by means of criminal force to recover possession of their cattle seized for trespass, and who made use of such force and took away their cattle, were held guilty of rioting.¹³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that five or more persons were assembled.

In the absence of a definite finding that five or more people took part in the occurrence, a conviction for rioting cannot be sustained.¹⁴ Where the finding is that more than five persons took part in the riot, the conviction of less than five persons is not illegal.¹⁵

(2) That such assembly was unlawful when it was convened or subsequently became unlawful, having any one of the five objects specified in s. 141.

There must be a finding as to the existence of an unlawful assembly.¹⁶

(3) That such object was the common object of those composing such assembly.¹⁷

To sustain a conviction it is essential that the persons forming the unlawful assembly should be animated by a common object, and in the absence of such a finding the conviction is not sustainable and ought on that ground alone to be set aside.¹⁸ Where the common object has not been sustained, the High Court in a reference under s. 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code cannot invent another common object in order to support the conviction.¹⁹

(4) That the accused, or any member of such unlawful assembly, used force or violence.

(5) That such force or violence was used in the prosecution of such common object.

In cases of rioting it often happens that the Court may consider that the story told by the prosecution is false in some of its details, but is nevertheless sufficient to prove the guilt of the accused; but it is not permissible to base a conviction upon a hypothetical state of facts, which is quite unsupported by evidence, which was never put forward by the prosecution, and which was never suggested to the accused as being the case they had to meet.²⁰

In a charge of rioting where a number of men are accused, the Magistrate should deal with the case of each of the accused separately or discuss the evidence against each of the accused, especially when the evidence against each of the accused is by no means equally strong.²¹

Where the evidence of the prosecution is interested and where a considerable amount of enmity exists between the factions, the Court must scrutinize the evidence very carefully.²²

In order to establish that a party acted in the exercise of the right of private defence in a riot, it lies upon such party to establish the circumstances under which each blow that caused an injury to a member of the opposite party was inflicted.²³

The absence of injuries on the persons of the alleged rioters arrested shortly after the occurrence is a point which in a case where the evidence is uncertain and partisan must operate as a ground for giving the benefit of doubt as to their participation in the offence.²⁴

Procedure.—Cognizable Warrant — Bailable — Not compoundable²⁵— Any Magistrate.

Security.—Security for keeping the peace on conviction may be demanded under s. 106, Criminal Procedure Code.

Separate trial.—Where two opposite factions commit a riot, it is irregular to treat both parties as constituting one unlawful assembly, and to try them together, as they had not one common object within the meaning of s. 141; and each party should be tried separately.¹

to be a compoundable one or that the consequence of his action might probably, in his view, be better for the complainant: Hira Singh, (1907) P. R. No. 11 of 1907, 6 Cr. L. J. 336. Offences under s. 143 were regarded by the Legislature as concerning persons other than those immediately involved; these offences are offences, which directly affect the public peace and the conclusion of criminal cases relating to them is something more than a matter for agreement between individuals: Agha Nazarali, [1941] Kar. 352, 358.

Where there is a fight between two rival factions which gives rise to complaint and counter-complaint, the most desirable procedure is that both the cases should be tried by the same Judge, though with different assessors and juries. The first case should be tried to a conclusion and the verdict of the jury or the opinion of the assessors taken. The Judge, however, should postpone judgment in that case till he has heard the second case to a conclusion, and he should then pronounce judgments separately in each case. He is bound to confine his judgment in each case to the evidence led in that particular case and is not at liberty to use the evidence in one case for the purpose of the judgment in the other case and to allow his findings in one case to be influenced in any manner to the prejudice of the accused by the views which he may have formed in the other case. It is obviously necessary in such case that he should try the two cases in quick succession one after the other. In cases of difficulty, however, it is open to the Judge to get the second case transferred.²

Charge to jury.—The common object of an unlawful assembly can change in the course of an occurrence. A crowd may have a common object at one time and may have another common object as things develop, and it may well be that there are various common objects in the course of an occurrence, and these all have to be placed before a jury in order that the jury may decide if any of them has been proved against the accused and if so which of them.³

Cumulative sentences.—Separate sentences may be passed under this section and s. 323 (causing hurt);⁴ or under this section and s. 325 (causing grievous hurt).⁵ The Madras High Court considers this illegal.⁶ The Calcutta High Court in a case held that a double sentence under this section and s. 353 was illegal where the force which was used, and which formed one of the component elements of the offence of rioting, was criminal force used to public servants.⁷ But in a later case it laid down that separate sentences might be passed.⁸ Where the common object of the members of an unlawful assembly was to compel Excise officers to abandon the search of certain houses and, after this object was achieved, some of the members proceeded to assault the officers, the Patna High Court held that there could be no doubt that the assault was made in furtherance of the common intention of the assailants, and that they were liable to be convicted under s. 147 and s. 353.⁹ Though under s. 146 the use of force or violence is a necessary ingredient of the offence of rioting, yet separate sentences passed on those who actually used force or violence are not illegal.¹⁰ Where an accused person was found with several others to have entered upon another person's land with the common object of cutting crops standing on it, and in prosecution of that object hurt was caused, it was held that the accused could not be convicted and sentenced for criminal trespass under s. 447, in addition to a conviction and sentence for rioting under this section, the common object of the riot and the intention in the criminal trespass being substantially the same in the case.¹¹ Where the common object of an unlawful assembly was to assault the police-officers in discharging their duty and hurt was actually caused to some of them, separate sentences under this section and s. 332 were disallowed and the sentence under s. 332 was only maintained.¹² Under the amended s. 35, Criminal Procedure Code, separate sentences may be passed subject to s. 71 of the Penal Code.

No separate sentences should be passed for rioting and theft, when it is not shown that any one of the rioters individually committed theft.¹³

As regards punishment, see s. 71, supra.

1. Lahore Rule.—Riots resulting in serious injuries or even death are of frequent occurrence in this Province, and cases relating to such riots require very careful handling. A large number of persons is generally involved and the evidence is often entirely of a partisan character. There is, moreover, great danger of innocent persons being implicated along with the guilty, owing to the tendency of the parties in such cases to try to implicate falsely as many of their enemies as they can.

2. The parties generally give widely divergent versions of the riot and in such cases the Police usually prosecute members of both the parties and place the divergent versions and the evidence in support thereof before the Court. It is for the Court to ascertain in such cases which of the two versions is correct and the Court cannot shirk this duty on the ground that the Police did not ascertain which of the stories was true (cf. 2 P. R. 1913).

3. When both parties deliberately engage in a fight no question of the right of self-defence arises. But, otherwise, the question as to which of the parties was the aggressor and which was acting in self-defence becomes of vital importance and the Court must do its best to arrive at a finding thereon for the party acting in self-defence cannot be held to be guilty of any offence unless the right of private defence is exceeded (see sections 96-106, Indian Penal Code).

4. When both parties to a riot are prosecuted, the two cases must be tried separately and evidence in the one case cannot be treated as evidence in the other, even with the consent of the parties (IV I. L. R. Lahore 376). Similarly judgments in such cases should be written separately and care should be taken to see that the evidence in the one case is not imported into the judgment in the other. Sometimes Courts consider it convenient to dispose of such cases in a single judgment, but in doing so they are liable to mix up the evidence in the two records. Even when the Lower Courts are careful enough not to mix up the evidence, the mere fact of their having written one judgment furnishes the convicts with a ground of appeal that the directions of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Madat Khan v. The King Emperor (I. L. R. VIII Lah. 193) have not been followed. Such objections have to be heard, examined and decided and a good deal of the time of the appellate Court is thus wasted.

5. In recording evidence in riot cases, care should be taken to bring out distinctly as far as possible the connection of each of the accused with the crime and the actual part played by him. In the judgment the evidence against each of the accused should be discussed separately along with the evidence produced by him in defence (if any), and should be scrutinized with care. The possibility of innocent persons being falsely implicated should be always borne in mind. The mention or omission of the name of an accused person in the First Information Report, when such report is made promptly by an eye-witness, and the presence or absence of injuries on his person are worthy of consideration in this respect, though these are, of course, by no means conclusive.

6. A charge of rioting presupposes the existence of an unlawful assembly with a common object as defined in section 141 of the Indian Penal Code. No charge of rioting can be sustained against any person unless it is proved that he was a member of such an unlawful assembly, and that one or more members of the assembly used force or violence in prosecution of its common object. It is, therefore, advisable to refer to the unlawful assembly, its common object, and the use of violence in the charge, so that the essential ingredients of the offence are not lost sight of. A lucid statement of the law of unlawful assembly and riot by Plowden, J., will be found in 4 P. R., 1889.

7. When a number of offences are committed by members of an unlawful assembly in the course of the riot in prosecution of their common object, each member is guilty not only of rioting but of every other offence committed by himself or by the other members of the unlawful assembly. Under section 35 of the Criminal Procedure Code he is liable to be punished separately for each of such offences, subject to the provisions of section 71 of the Indian Penal Code. As regards the bearing of the latter section on the question of separate sentences where a series of acts of violence is committed in the course of the riot, a Full Bench ruling of the Punjab Chief Court—4 P. R., 1901—may be consulted. Section 35 of the Criminal Procedure Code enables the Court to make the sentences for two or more of such offences concurrent. The appropriate sentence in the case of each accused person must, of course, be determined in view of all the circumstances of the crime and the actual part played by him.¹⁴

Charge.—The common object of the assembly must be stated in the charge in order to give the accused person an opportunity of meeting it.¹⁵ A conviction for rioting, based upon a charge, which does not specify the common object of the assembly charged with rioting, is improper.¹⁶ But the omission to set out the common object does not necessarily make the conviction bad. It is necessary to see whether or not the accused has been misled by the omission and the omission has caused a failure of justice.¹⁷ It is not a general proposition of law that a conviction under this section cannot be supported whenever the common object as stated in the charge is not precisely made out. The question in each case is whether the common object established agrees in essential particulars with that laid in the charge. Where the common object set out in the charge was to assault the complainant and his party, who were cutting the paddy on their land, and thereby to forcibly oust them, but the common object established by the facts found was to maintain possession of the land by the accused, it was held that the common object in the charge had not been substantially made out, and that the conviction under this section was bad.¹⁸ In all cases of unlawful assembly the principal and the prominent common object should form the subject of the charge and not the incidental happenings. Where the charge against the accused was that they had formed themselves into an unlawful assembly with the common object of assaulting the complainant, but it was found that the common object was to set fire to the complainant's house and not to assault him, it was held that the accused should be acquitted inasmuch as the charge as laid was not proved.¹⁹ Where the common object charged was by means of criminal force to obtain possession of certain lands which comprised two plots, one of fifteen cottahs and the other of five cottahs, and it was found by the Court that the offence was committed for obtaining possession of the five cottahs plot, it was held that the variance between the common object alleged and that found was not such as to invalidate the conviction.²⁰ Where a charge, as drawn up by the Magistrate, alleged several alternative common objects of the unlawful assembly, it was incumbent on the appellate Court to determine, whether it was sustainable, and, if so, which of the common objects stated had been made out.²¹ Where the common object of an unlawful assembly was clearly set out in the charge and there was no question in the lower Courts as to the common object so set out, a conviction for rioting with the object set out was good even though there might be no express finding as to the common object, if the accused had not been in any way prejudiced by the absence of such finding.²² Where the charge did not specify the property, the taking possession of which was stated to be the common object of the unlawful assembly, and its specification would have altered the whole complexion of the case, it was held that the omission had prejudiced the accused and was not cured by s. 537, cl. (a), of the Code of Criminal Procedure.²³ Where the common object of an unlawful assembly was stated in the charge to have been to cause obstruction to measurement and demarcation of Khas Mahal land, it was held that if it was not established that the land was in the actual possession of the Government, the charge as laid was not proved.²⁴

Where, in a trial for offences for rioting with the common object of assaulting certain persons, specific acts of violence were charged against some of the accused persons but not against others, the latter might nevertheless be convicted in respect of assaults proved to have been committed by them on persons referred to in the statement of the common object even though the charge of rioting failed, provided the Court was satisfied that they had not been misled in their defence.²⁵ Where the members of an unlawful assembly trespassed upon the lands of several persons, and caused damage to their crops in the course of a riot, a separate offence of trespass and mischief could be charged against the members of the assembly in respect of each separate holding which was damaged, and acquittal or conviction in respect of damage caused to the holdings of some of the owners was no bar to their trial for offences in connection with the properties of the other owners.¹ In cases of rioting it is usual to charge the accused individually also for acts that they are said to have committed. If that is not done the accused may have cause for argument that when the main charge of rioting and acting in concert in pursuance of a common intention has failed, they ought not to be convicted for the particular acts committed by them.²

In a trial for a charge under this section, it is not illegal to frame charges under ss. 324 and 325 against particular accused persons, although these offences were committed by them outside the scope of the common object mentioned in the charge under this section, if all the acts with which the accused are charged form one transaction.³ The offence of rioting does not of itself connote the causing of hurt and there can be no conviction for causing hurt under s. 323 after an acquittal of the charge of rioting if it is not indicated in the charge that the accused did cause hurt.⁴

Where the offence alleged to have been committed by the members of an unlawful assembly in furtherance of their common object is hurt, it is sufficient to state in the charge that the common object was "to assault" the persons to whom hurt was caused.⁵

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, were a member of an unlawful assembly, and, in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, viz., in—, committed the offence of rioting, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 147 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

148. Whoever is guilty of rioting, being armed¹ with a deadly weapon² or with anything which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

pon.

COMMENT.

The offence under this section is an aggravated form of the offence under the last section. Enhanced punishment is provided if a person is armed with a deadly weapon. This section bears the same relation to s. 147 just as s. 144 does to s. 143. It does not create a separate offence.⁶

1. 'Being armed'.—If one member of an unlawful assembly is armed with a deadly weapon, the other members cannot on that account be charged under this section. It is only the actual person so armed who can be charged under it.⁷ The

Madras High Court in a case held that a person who is a member of an unlawful assembly can be guilty under this section, when he himself is not armed with a deadly weapon, but some other member of the assembly is so armed.⁸ But this decision has been doubted in a subsequent case in which it is laid down that s. 149 of the Code can hardly have been intended to make rioters constructively guilty of the offence of rioting. That section is intended to lay upon all the members of an unlawful assembly responsibility for any offences, other than the offence of rioting, committed by any member of the unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object.⁹ A person cannot be found guilty under this section unless he actually has a dangerous weapon in his hands.¹⁰

2. 'Deadly weapon'.—Such as fire-arms, swords, etc. The question whether or not a club (lathi) is a deadly weapon is a question of fact to be determined on the special circumstances of each case.¹¹ A lathi in itself is not a deadly weapon, unless and until it is used on the head or on some vital part of a person.¹² Stout male bamboos are deadly weapons.¹³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1) to (5) as in s. 147; and further (6) That the accused was armed with a deadly weapon, or with something which was likely to cause death, when used as a deadly weapon.

A charge under this section read with s. 149 is incongruous and improper. A person can be convicted under this section only where there is a finding that the particular accused was present in the mob armed with a deadly weapon.¹⁴

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, were a member of an unlawful assembly, and did, in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, viz., in—, commit the offence of rioting with a deadly weapon (or with something which used as a weapon of offence was likely to cause death) to wit—, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 148 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.¹⁵

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

149. If an offence is committed by any member of an unlawful assembly¹ in prosecution of the common object of that assembly,² or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed³ in prosecution of that object, every person who, at the time of the committing of that offence, is a member of the same assembly, is guilty of that offence.

Every member of unlawful assembly guilty of offence committed in prosecution of common object.

COMMENT.

Principle.—An accused person whose case falls within the terms of this section cannot put forward the defence that he did not with his own hand commit the offence committed in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly or such as the members of the assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object.¹⁶ "S. 149 declares in substance that every member of an unlawful assembly is responsible for an offence committed by another member, or the other members, in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, or one which he must have known was reasonably likely to be committed in the prosecution of such common object. In other words, this provision, so to speak, takes him out of the region of abetment, and makes him responsible as a principal for the acts of each, and all, merely because he is a member of an unlawful assembly."¹⁷ If it is not possible to bring home the guilt to the accused under s. 325 read with this section then a fortiori it would be more difficult to bring home the guilt with the aid of s. 34.¹⁸

Sections 34 and 149.—Section 34 and this section deal with liability for constructive criminality, i.e., liability for an offence not committed by the person charged.

"Sect. 149...creates a specific offence and deals with the punishment of that offence alone. It postulates an assembly of five or more persons having a common object—namely, one of those named in s. 141 [*The Queen v. Sabid Ali*¹⁹] and then the doing of acts by members of it in prosecution of that object. There is a difference between object and intention, for, though their object is common, the intentions of the several members may differ and indeed may be similar only in respect that they are all unlawful, while the element of participation in action, which is the leading feature of s. 34, is replaced in s. 149 by membership of the assembly at the time of the committing of the offence. Both sections deal with combinations of persons, who become punishable as sharers in an offence. Thus they have a certain resemblance and may to some extent overlap, but s. 149 cannot at any rate relegate s. 34 to the position of dealing only with joint action by the commission of indistinguishably similar criminal acts, a kind of case which is not in itself deserving of separate treatment at all."²⁰ Section 34 refers to cases in which several persons both intend to do and do an act; it does not refer to cases where several persons intend to do an act and some one or more of them do an entirely different act. In the latter class of cases s. 149 may be applicable but s. 34 is not.²¹ On the other hand, if several persons numbering five or more, both do an act and intend to do it, both s. 34 and s. 149 may apply, since the singular "member" in s. 149 includes the plural (s. 9, supra). The basis of constructive guilt under s. 149 is mere membership of an unlawful assembly; the basis under s. 34 is participation in some action with the common intention of committing a crime. In a case to which s. 149 does not apply, all the accused persons can be found guilty of the offence constructively under s. 34 only on a finding that each of them took some part or other—in or towards the commission of the offence.²² Thus there is a clear distinction between s. 34 and this section.²³

Scope.—This section is not intended to subject a member of an unlawful assembly to punishment for every offence which is committed by one of its members during the time they are engaged in the prosecution of the common object. It is divided into two parts: (1) an offence committed by a member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of that assembly; and (2) an offence such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object. In order to bring a case within the first part the act must be one which, upon the evidence, appears to have been done with a view to accomplish the common object. "At first, there does not seem to be much distinction between the two parts of the section, and...the cases which would be within the first offences committed in prosecution of the common object would be, generally, if not always, within the second, namely, offences which the parties knew to be likely to be committed in the prosecution of the common object. But...there may be cases which would come within the second part, and not within the first...Persons assemble with a view to attack and plunder the house of a particular person; that would be an unlawful assembly, and the common object of the assembly would be house-breaking or the other offences which would be included in such acts as attacking and plundering a man's house; but from some cause, such as a show of resistance, they might not continue to prosecute that common object; and before they had dispersed, and whilst they continued to be an unlawful assembly, some of them might plunder another house, and thereby commit an offence. Such a case might come within the second part."²⁴

In Sabid Ali's case, Phear, J., says that "inasmuch as the continuance of the unlawful assembly is, by the definition of section 141, made contemporaneous with the prosecution of the common object, it seems tolerably clear that the Legislature must have employed the words 'prosecution of the common object' with some difference of meaning in these two passages...(the two parts of the section). Also the mere fact that the Legislature thought fit to express the second alternative appears to show very distinctly that it did not intend the words 'in prosecution', which are found in the first, to be equivalent to 'during the prosecution'; for if they were, then the second alternative would have clearly been unnecessary...an offence, in order to fall within the first of the above alternatives, i.e., in order to be committed in the prosecution of the common object, must be immediately connected with that common object by virtue of the nature of the object...an offence will fall within the second alternative, if the members of the assembly, for any reason, knew beforehand that it was likely to be committed in the prosecution of the common object, though not knit thereto by the nature of the object itself."²⁵

In dealing with cases under this section, while on the one hand it is necessary for the protection of the accused that he should not, merely by reason of his association with others as members of an unlawful assembly, be held criminally liable for offences committed by his associates, which he himself neither intended, nor knew to be likely to be committed, on the other hand, it is equally necessary for the protection of the peace that members of an unlawful assembly should not lightly be let off from suffering the penalties for offences for which, though committed by others, the law has made them punishable by reason of their association with the actual offender with one common object. These two cases respectively emphasize the necessity of keeping these considerations in view. Members of an unlawful assembly may have a community of object only up to a certain point, beyond which they may differ in their objects, and the knowledge possessed by each member of what is likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object will vary, not only according to the information at his command, but also according to the extent to which he shares the community of object, and as a consequence of this the effect of this section may be different on different members of the same unlawful assembly.¹

This section is inapplicable to an offence under s. 396, but where an unlawful assembly has existed from the very outset before a dacoity with murder is committed in the course of a riot, this section is applicable.²

This section is not intended to make rioters constructively guilty of the offence of rioting.³

Ingredients.—The section has the following essentials :—

1. Commission of an offence by any member of an unlawful assembly.
2. Such offence must have been committed in prosecution of the common object of that assembly; or must be such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed.

1. 'Offence is committed'.—As to the meaning of 'offence' see s. 40; and of 'unlawful assembly', s. 141. This section only applies where there is an unlawful assembly.⁴ The word 'offence' in this section means only an offence under the Penal Code. It does not include offences under a special Act. This section, therefore, cannot be applied to offences created by the Indian Railways Act, 1890,⁵ or the Defence of India Rules, 1939.⁶ Where the accused were members of an unlawful assembly some other members of which removed railway rails, sleepers, etc., and there was no evidence that the accused themselves took any active part in any act specified by s. 126 of the Indian Railways Act, it was held that the accused could not be held constructively guilty of an offence under the Railways Act.⁷

2. 'By any member of an unlawful assembly.'—The section applies equally in cases where offences are committed by a single member of the assembly and in cases where offences are committed by two or more members of the assembly acting in furtherance of a common intention. If an offence is committed, whether by a single member of the assembly or by a group of members, the other members of the assembly may be liable under this section.⁸ M and his party were ploughing certain disputed land when the members of the complainant's party came up to interfere with them and to turn them out. The Sessions Judge found that the latter were not justified in forcibly preventing the ploughing of M's party and that on the other hand M was not justified in striking B (one of the complainant's party) on the head and thereby causing his death. It was held that as the members of the deceased's party were the aggressors, their object having been to dispossess the other party from the land, M's party were perfectly justified in exercising their right of private defence, and if M exceeded that right, he, and he alone, was guilty of the offence and this section did not operate to make M's companions equally guilty with him, as they were not at the time members of an unlawful assembly.⁹

3. 'In prosecution of the common object of that assembly.'—This phrase does not mean the same as the phrase "during the prosecution of the common object of the assembly." It means that the offence committed was immediately connected with the common object of the unlawful assembly, of which the accused were members. In other words, the act must be one which upon the evidence appears to have been done with a view to accomplish the common object attributed to the members of the unlawful assembly.¹⁰ The words "in prosecution of the common object" in the first clause of this section must be strictly construed as equivalent to "in order to attain the common object." When a person has already attained or caught up with his object and passes beyond it he can no longer be said to be pursuing or prosecuting it.¹¹ The test whether an offence is committed in prosecution of the common object is whether the common object is prosecuted in fact as well as in the intention of the doer. When that is the case, every person who is engaged in prosecuting the same object may well be held guilty of an offence which fulfils or tends to fulfil the object which he is himself engaged in prosecuting. No offence, however, executes or tends to execute the common object, unless the commission of that offence is involved in the common object. When this is not the case, the offence committed not being committed in prosecution of the common object, in its strict sense, may yet fall under the second branch.¹² The existence of a common object before the commencement of the fight is not necessary. It is enough if the common object is adopted by all the accused.¹³ See ss. 34 and 111, supra.

The expression 'common object' is not used in the same sense as 'the common intention' in s. 34, which means the intention of all whatever it may have been. The expression refers to one of the five objects mentioned in s. 141. The object of an assembly as a whole may not be the same as the intention which several persons may have when in pursuance of that intention they perform a criminal act and it may well be that the object of the assembly was lawful whereas the intention common to those of the assembly who jointly committed a criminal act was in itself criminal and the joint criminal act must be equally imputed to all of them.¹⁴

The Patna High Court held that where the principal offender in a case of rioting is convicted of an offence the others cannot be held to have committed constructively an offence different from the offence found to have been committed by the principal offender. Therefore, where the principal offender was convicted under s. 302, it was held that the others could not be convicted under s. 304 read with this section.¹⁵ This view has been dissented from by the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Sind which is of opinion that it is not necessary that all the members of an unlawful assembly should either be found guilty of and convicted for an offence of which the principal is convicted or that they should all be acquitted. It is permissible to convict them of a minor offence which is included in the offence for which the principal is convicted.¹⁶ The Patna High Court has in a later case dissented from its earlier decision in Ram Prasad Singh and held that in construing s. 149 a question arises whether a member of the assembly is guilty necessarily of the same offence as the principal offender or whether it is to be determined, with reference to the facts of the case, what offence the members must have been known to be likely to be committed and whether if such offence is a minor offence they should be convicted accordingly. The latter construction appears to be more in accordance with the intention of the legislature on a reading of the words of the section. This view is consistent with the principles laid down in ss. 35 and 38 of the Code. And the principle of ss. 38 and 110 applies to offences under this section and the liability of individual members of an unlawful assembly under the latter section depends on the intention or knowledge of the members.¹⁷ Once the Court can find that an offence has been committed by some member or members of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object, then whether the principal offender has been convicted for that offence or not, the other members may be constructively convicted of that offence, provided they are found to have had the necessary intention or knowledge.

It is not correct to say that when a member of an unlawful assembly is to be found constructively guilty of an offence under this section, it must be the same offence of which the principal is convicted and not some other offence.¹⁸

4. 'Or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed.'—The word 'or' divides the definition into two branches.¹⁹ It is not used in an alternative sense.²⁰ The expression "such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed" imports at least an expectation founded upon facts known to all the members of the assembly that an offence of the particular kind committed would be committed: something more than a speculation that such an offence might happen to be committed.²¹ The word "knew" indicates a state of mind at the time of the commission of the offence and not the knowledge acquired in the light of subsequent events.²² The word "knew" is advisedly used, and cannot be made to bear the sense of "might have known".²³ If the offence be such as the members of the assembly knew to be likely to be committed by a person engaged in prosecuting the common object, and acting with the purpose of executing it, it may fairly be imputed to the other members of the assembly.

Thus this section does not subject any person to the consequences of an offence which, though committed in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly, he himself had not directly contemplated, unless it were proved he knew it to be likely that such offence would be so committed.²⁴

Culpable homicide.—To bring the offence of murder within this section, it must either necessarily flow from the prosecution of the common object or it must so probably flow from the prosecution of the common object that each member might antecedently expect it to happen. The offence of murder, as strictly defined by the Code, requires a previous intention or knowledge in the perpetrator; and to 'know' that murder is likely to be committed, is to know that some member of the assembly has such previous intention or knowledge. This interpretation of the section, so far as murder is concerned, is confirmed by comparing ss. 398 and 396 with s. 148 and this section.²⁵ Members of a party setting out heavily armed for the purpose of committing dacoity must know that there is every likelihood of something occurring either on their way or at the scene of dacoity to interfere with their criminal plans and that their deliberate intention is to use their arms wherever necessary, either to effect the object in view or to avoid the risk of capture at any stage of the adventure, and therefore if some of the members of the party fire upon the police killing any one, all are guilty of the offence of murder under this section and s. 302.¹ Where in a free fight between two parties a person of one party received injuries from the other party, from the result of which he died but the evidence did not disclose who of the participants was the actual person to inflict the injuries which caused the death, it was held that it was not a correct view of law that the culpability could not be brought home to all the persons taking part in the fight.²

In order to sustain a conviction under this section and s. 304, it must be shown that there was an unlawful assembly whose common object was to commit an offence under s. 304 and that the accused was one of them.³ Where the members of an unlawful assembly assailed their victim and one of them, a Sikh, who was wearing a kirpan (a dagger-like weapon) unsheathed it and caused a fatal blow, it was held that all the members of the unlawful assembly could not be constructively held liable for the causing of death simply because one of them was wearing a kirpan, a weapon which is carried by most Sikhs as an emblem of their religion and not for the purposes of offence or defence.⁴

Where a prisoner is constructively guilty of murder under s. 34, it is doubtful if he can be said to have committed the offence of murder within the meaning of this section, so as to make the other prisoners, by a double construction, guilty of murder.⁵

CASES.

Act done in prosecution of common object.—Where a member of an unlawful assembly caused a fatal wound when the unlawful assembly was prosecuting its common object, all the members of the unlawful assembly were equally held to be responsible.⁶ Where persons joined an unlawful assembly for the purpose of committing an assault, and, instead of preventing those armed from using their weapons, encouraged them to do so, they were held to be in the same position as those members of the unlawful assembly who struck the blows.⁷ Where each of several persons took part in beating a person so as to break eighteen ribs and cause his death, each of them was held to be guilty, as a principal, of the murder of the deceased.⁸ Where two members of an unlawful assembly used spears and deliberately pierced another man through the chest and abdomen, with the knowledge that death was likely to ensue, although without proof of any intention to cause death, all the members of the unlawful assembly were held guilty of murder.⁹ Where a small compact body of men armed with clubs, and headed by a man carrying a gun, endeavoured to take forcible possession of certain lands, and one of the opponents was shot by their leader, it was held that all of them were guilty of murder.¹⁰ The accused's cattle were doing considerable damage to the crops belonging to complainants who drove them to the cattle-pound. While they were on the way to the pound the accused came armed with clubs, to rescue the cattle. At the command given by one of them, the others assaulted the deceased and beat him with the result that he died. It was held that the offence was committed in pursuance of the common object and each one of the accused was guilty of an offence under s. 302.¹¹ Where a number of persons set out to abduct women and two of them were armed with pistols and a person was shot in the prosecution of the common object, it was held that the obvious inference to be drawn was that the pistols were intended to be used, if necessary, to overcome any resistance that might be offered and the members of the gang knew that murder was very likely to be committed, and that the accused were constructively guilty of murder though they were not the murderers.¹² Where persons forming an unlawful assembly set out to beat a person and, not finding him, began to loot people and did not disperse when the police arrived but attacked the police and killed a police-officer, they were held guilty of committing offences under ss. 302 and 396 read with this section.¹³ Seven accused persons armed with lathis went to the house of the deceased with the common object of abducting a woman and murdering the deceased. They divided themselves into two batches, one entrusted to abduct and another to murder. The murder was committed by the second batch. It was held (acquitting one of the seven accused) that all the six assailants were guilty of murder under s. 302, because they were members of an unlawful assembly, the common object of which was to abduct deceased's wife and murder the deceased.¹⁴ Where the common object of an unlawful assembly was to attack two persons and in furtherance of that object some of the accused attacked and killed one of the two, it was held that all the accused were guilty under s. 302 read with this section.¹⁵ The party of the complainants and also that of the accused had assembled at a certain house to celebrate a wedding. The complainants' party consisted of five persons and that of the accused six. One of the complainants' party refused to allow the accused's party to join in the hugga for certain acts of the accused. This was very irritating to the accused, two of whom left and shortly afterwards returned with the other accused armed with chavis and lathis. The complainants, who were unarmed except for a spade which one of them had picked up to defend himself, were ready and willing to fight and did not wait to be attacked but went out of the house to meet the accused. A free fight ensued in which one of the complainants' party received a fatal injury. It was held that the accused were guilty under ss. 326 and 148 read with this section.¹⁶

Person retiring from fight has no further common object with those continuing it.—A large body of men belonging to one faction waylaid another body of men belonging to a second faction, and a fight ensued, in the course of which a member of the first mentioned faction was wounded, and retired to the side of the road, taking no further active part in the affray. After his retirement, a member of the second faction was killed. It was held that the wounded man had ceased to be a member of the unlawful assembly when he retired wounded, and that he could not, under this section, be made liable for the subsequent murder.¹⁷

Persons having no common object to commit particular offence are not liable for commission of it by others.—Where six persons at first united in abusing another and afterwards one of the six ordered him to be seized,—three others executed the order, and in doing so killed the person abused,—it was held that the remaining two accused were not liable to punishment, as the party had no illegal object in common until the deceased was ordered to be seized, and the evidence went to show that they took no part in it, but were merely unarmed spectators.¹⁸ Similarly, where a number of persons went together to eject a man from a plot of land, the title of which was in dispute, and upon a vigorous resistance being made, one of the party who was armed with a gun, fired at, and killed, the resisting person, it was held that he was guilty of murder, but that the other members of the unlawful assembly were not guilty of murder under this section as the act of killing was not the common object of the assembly, or "likely to be committed in the prosecution of that object."¹⁹ A murder was committed by one of a number of persons concerned in an unlawful assembly, one or two of them being armed with weapons of a deadly nature. It was held that the accused who actually took life was guilty of murder, but that the others were guilty of the minor offence of rioting. The question whether the other persons were guilty of murder depended upon the consideration whether such persons knew that a deadly weapon was likely to be used with a fatal result in the prosecution of their common object; and that though it might be presumed, in the case of a number of persons armed with deadly weapons going out to commit an act of violence, that they knew that those weapons might be used with a fatal result, the presumption was still one of fact and must be reasonable in the particular circumstances of the case.²⁰ A gang of persons, making preparations to commit dacoity, was discovered in the limits of a certain village and was pursued by villagers who seized and arrested two accused who were members of the gang. Shortly afterwards, a dacoit at large fired a gun and killed one of the villagers. It was held that the two accused were not guilty of murder as there could be no common object between them and the other after they separated.²¹ Where, after the object of an unlawful assembly was accomplished, and the opposite party driven away, one of the members entered into an altercation with another and wounded him with a fish-spear, it was held that he alone was responsible for the offence.²² Where a riotous mob started pelting stones, etc., with the intention of wreaking vengeance on the proprietor of a Dramatic Troupe for his refusal to give away the day's takings to the Congress and Khilafat funds, but when the police started fire, the common object changed into one of vengeance on the Deputy Superintendent consequent on one of the mob having been shot dead, it was held that persons who were present in the mob only at the first attack were not guilty of offences committed in the second attack and conversely those present only at the second attack were not guilty of the offences committed in the first attack.²³ Where the common object of the rioters was the abducting and murdering of a certain person the injuries caused by one or two of them to another person being the individual act of particular rioters and not in the prosecution of the common object, the other rioters were not guilty of an offence under s. 325 read with this section.²⁴ Where a gang, whose common object was to commit dacoity, was arrested and one of the members of the gang with the intention to make his escape fired at the pursuers and shot a person dead, the other members of the gang could not be convicted of an offence under s. 302 read with this section notwithstanding the fact that the members of the gang carried arms in order to overawe the people of the village or of the house in which they intended to commit dacoity and overcome any resistance.²⁵ Where in a case of rioting and burning of houses, the common intention of all the accused was not to burn houses, it was held that all the accused could not be convicted under s. 436 read with this section.¹ Where the accused's party went to a field to protest against the harvesting of the same by the complainant's party and the latter abandoned the reaping and thereafter some of the accused assaulted the complainant's party, it was held that as some section or individual members of the accused's party took the matter into their own hands and attacked people on the other side that would not make all the persons who had gone there merely to protest and took no part in the assault and did not share the common object of the assailants liable to punishment.² A crowd of Muslims, the common object of which was to obstruct a procession organized by the Hindus, threw stones and committed other acts of violence. One of the crowd stabbed with knife the Police Sub-Inspector who was leading the procession. The accused was shown to have participated in throwing stones at the processionists. It was held that the accused were guilty of rioting for throwing stones at the procession. They could not be held constructively liable under this section read with s. 302 for the murder of the Sub-Inspector because the stabbing of the Sub-Inspector was an isolated act by an individual rioter and it could not be said that the other members of the unlawful assembly knew it to be likely that the stabbing of the Sub-Inspector would be committed in prosecution of the common object.³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that there was an unlawful assembly.

(2) That the accused was a member of that unlawful assembly (s. 142).

(3) That he had intentionally joined or continued in such unlawful assembly.

(4) That an offence was committed by a member of such assembly.

(5) That such offence was committed (a) in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, or (b) such as the members of the assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object, etc.

It is essential to prove that the person sought to be charged with an offence by the aid of this section was a member of the unlawful assembly at the time the offence was committed, and the burden of proof lies on the prosecution. Moreover, before an offence under any other section can be imputed under this section to all the persons who were members of an unlawful assembly at the time of its commission, it is necessary to show, among other things, that the offence sought to be imputed has been committed by a member of the assembly either known or unknown.⁴

When it is established that the number of offenders was five or more than five, the mere fact that some of them could not be identified does not affect the application of this section.⁵

If there are two explanations of the presence of a particular person on a particular occasion, one of which is lawful and the other of which is unlawful, the Court would not, as against an accused person, assume the unlawful intention.⁶

It may well be that a perfectly lawful assembly of citizens may become later a riotous mob and it may be that in the mob there will be a number of innocent people who do not share the common object of the rioters. When a person is found to be amongst a mob of rioters the law will presume that he shares their common object and intention. If he does not share that common object and intention, the onus is upon him to prove his innocence. What the common object and intention of a mob is, can only be inferred from its actions.⁷

Procedure.—Same as that for the offence committed. Not compoundable.

The Calcutta High Court has held that where a person is charged by implication under this section, he cannot be convicted of the substantive offence.⁸ The Madras High Court has dissented from this view and has laid down that when a charge has been framed under s. 326 and this section a conviction under s. 326 alone is not necessarily bad and that the legality of the conviction depends upon the question whether the accused was materially prejudiced by any omission in the charge.⁹ The same is the view of the Patna High Court.¹⁰ Where the accused have been acquitted of rioting they cannot be convicted of grievous hurt under s. 325 by the application of this section, where it has not been found that they or any of them were members of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object, of which grievous hurt was caused by any other member of the same assembly, or that the offence was such as each member of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object.¹¹

Order to give security.—The accused cannot be ordered to give security under s. 106 of the Criminal Procedure Code if they have been convicted of any offence read with s. 149 of the Penal Code. Where a Magistrate considers an order under s. 106, Criminal Procedure Code, is essential in the interest of public tranquillity, he should acquit the accused of offences read with s. 149 and restrict their conviction to offences under s. 147 or 148, Penal Code.¹²

Lahore Rule.—Section 149 of the Indian Penal Code, which makes every member of an unlawful assembly constructively liable for offences committed by other members in prosecution of the common object of the assembly, deserves careful study. If the number of offenders is ultimately found to be less than five, this section will not be applicable, but joint liability may still arise by virtue of s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code, if it is found that the act constituting the offence was committed in 'furtherance of the common intention of all'. As regards the precise scope and effect of s. 149 and s. 34, Indian Penal Code, 61 P. R. 1887 and 52 Cal. 197 (P. C.) may be consulted. When no joint liability can be established, each accused person can be held responsible only for his own acts.¹³

Trial by jury.—Where the trial is by jury the Sessions Judge ought, in commenting upon the provisions of this section, to draw the attention of the jury expressly to the common object.¹⁴

Charge.—An accused person is entitled to know with certainty and accuracy the exact value of the charge brought against him, where it is sought to implicate him for acts not committed by himself, but by others with whom he was in company.¹⁵ It is obligatory to set out the common object in the charge, otherwise the conviction would be vitiated.¹⁶ Where there is no count in the charge that the common object of the unlawful assembly was to commit dacoity, or to cause hurt for the purpose of committing theft, no conviction for dacoity by force of s. 34 or this section can be sustained.¹⁷ The former Chief Court of the Punjab ruled that it was not always necessary that the common object should be set out in the charge, but it was desirable to do so where the nature of the case allowed or required it. In any case such an omission was not a fatal defect and was curable under s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.¹⁸ The omission of this section from a charge does not create an illegality by reason of s. 233, Criminal Procedure Code. It is only an irregularity coming under s. 537 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.¹⁹ An accused person can be convicted under this section of a substantive offence even though no reference is made in the charge to this section. Where the accused was originally charged with and convicted of offences under ss. 147 and 353, but on appeal the convictions under s. 323 read with s. 149, and s. 353 read with s. 149 were substituted for the original convictions, it was held that s. 149 did not create a definite offence and that, therefore, omission to mention the section in the charge did not vitiate the convictions.²⁰

Where in a charge this section was mentioned instead of s. 34, it was held that the accused was not prejudiced because this section was wide enough to cover the principle of s. 34.²¹

The charge should run thus :—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, were a member of an unlawful assembly, and in prosecution of the common object of which, viz., in—one of the members—, caused (specify the offence) to—, and you are thereby, under s. 149 of the Indian Penal Code, guilty of causing the said (offence) an offence punishable under s.— of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of the Court of Session).²²

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

Punishment.—Separate sentences may be passed under s. 147 and any other section which becomes applicable to the accused with reference to the terms of this section.²³ The Madras High Court has held that on a conviction under some of the hurt sections read with this section, separate sentences to run consecutively cannot be imposed.²⁴ See s. 71, supra.

The contention that in a case of a conviction under s. 302 read with this section, the appropriate sentence in all cases must be transportation for life cannot be acceded to the question of sentence must in each case depend upon the facts of the case.²⁵

150. Whoever hires or engages, or employs, or promotes,¹ or Hiring, or conniving at hiring, of persons to join unlawful assembly.

connives² at the hiring, engagement or employment of any person to join or become a member of any unlawful assembly,³ shall be punishable as a member of such unlawful assembly, and for any offence⁴ which may be committed by any such person as a member of such unlawful assembly in pursuance of such hiring, engagement or employment, in the same manner as if he had been a member of such unlawful assembly, or himself had committed such offence.

COMMENT.

Object.—The object of this section is to bring within the reach of the law those who are really the originators and instigators of offences committed by hired persons. The ordinary law of abetment might be sufficient to punish those who, by hiring or engaging others, instigate them to join an unlawful assembly. But if the prime agent keeps aloof, and the work of hiring, although known to him, is left entirely to his manager or servants, he will probably succeed in evading the ordinary law. The terms of this section, therefore, extend not only to acts of instigation by the master, but to acts of instigation when done by others (his agents) and knowingly permitted, or connived at, by him.

1. 'Promotes'.—This word indicates cases of active assistance in hiring.

2. 'Connives'.—That is, passively allows.

3. 'Any unlawful assembly'.—This section refers to a particular unlawful assembly. Where, therefore, it is found that any person has hired or engaged any other person to join or become a member of a particular unlawful assembly, he is liable for any offence committed by any member of that unlawful assembly in the same way as if he had been a member of such unlawful assembly or himself had committed such offence. Where a Magistrate only found that "what the accused has been doing is collecting and harbouring men for the purpose of committing a riot should he find it in his interest to do so", and there was no finding that there had been any unlawful assembly, composed of persons said to have been hired by the accused, and in the course of which some offence had been committed for which the accused would have been responsible equally with those who were members of that unlawful assembly, nor that an unlawful assembly made up of the elements provided for by s. 141 was in the contemplation of the accused, it was held that the accused could not be convicted of having committed an offence under this section or s. 157.¹

4. 'Offence'.—See s. 40, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused hired or engaged, etc., the person in question, or that he promoted, or connived at, such hiring, etc. In the case of connivance it should also be proved (a) that the accused was legally bound to prevent the hiring; (b) that he was physically able to prevent it; and (c) that he did not prevent it, or do all that lay in his power towards preventing it.

(2) That such hiring, etc., was to join, or to become a member of an unlawful assembly.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Not compoundable. See the offence committed.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, hired (or engaged, or employed) [or promoted (or connived at the hiring or engagement, or employment)] of one AB to join as (or become) a member of an unlawful assembly, and that the said AB as a member of such unlawful assembly in pursuance of such hiring (or engagement or employment) committed (specify the offence and the person), and that you have thereby committed an offence punishable under ss. 150 and——of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

151. Whoever knowingly joins or continues in any assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, after such assembly has been lawfully commanded to disperse,¹ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Knowingly joining or continuing in assembly of five or more persons after it has been commanded to disperse.

Explanation.—If the assembly is an unlawful assembly within the meaning of section 141, the offender will be punishable under section 145.

COMMENT.

The offence under this section consists in the disobedience to the mandate of the law, which has ordered the assembly to disperse. Section 145 provides for the punishment of a person who joins or continues in an unlawful assembly knowing it has been commanded to disperse. The 'assembly' under this section need not be an 'unlawful assembly'. It must only be an assembly likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace. The section does not apply to cases in which the assembly is unlawful from its inception or has become so before the command for dispersal is given.²

1. 'After such assembly has been lawfully commanded to disperse'.—Any Magistrate or officer in charge of a police-station may command any unlawful assembly, or any assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, to disperse; and it shall thereupon be the duty of the members of such assembly to disperse accordingly.³ If, upon being so commanded, any such assembly does not disperse, or if, without being so commanded, it conducts itself in such a manner as to show a determination not to disperse, any Magistrate or officer in charge of a police station, whether within or without the presidency-towns, may proceed to disperse such assembly by force, and may require the assistance of any male person, not being an officer soldier, sailor or airman in His Majesty's Army, Navy or Air Force or a volunteer enrolled under the Indian Volunteers Act (XX of 1869), and acting as such, for the purpose of dispersing such assembly, and, if necessary, arresting and confining the persons who form part of it, in order to disperse such assembly or that they may be punished according to law.⁴ If any such assembly cannot be otherwise dispersed, and if it is necessary for the public security that it should be dispersed, the Magistrate of the highest rank who is present may cause it to be dispersed by military force.⁵

The expression "lawfully commanded to disperse" means, in the City of Bombay, commanded as prescribed in s. 40 of the City of Bombay Police Act, 1902.⁶

C A S E S .

Refusal to disperse.—Where the object of only three persons was to draw a crowd and their action was such as was calculated to and did draw a crowd of fifty or sixty persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, it was held that the gathering constituted an assembly of five or more persons within the meaning of this section and a refusal to disperse after being lawfully commanded by an officer superior in rank to an officer in charge of a police-station rendered the members liable to punishment.⁷

A procession of Hindus, some of them carrying and using various musical instruments, was about to pass in front of a mosque, with the probable consequence in the circumstances that a serious riot would have resulted, when they were confronted by a Sub-Inspector of Police, who ordered the leaders of the procession to stop the music and that the crowd should disperse. The leaders of the procession did not obey the order of the Sub-Inspector, but on the contrary advanced a short distance playing on a drum. Subsequently, however, on a show of force being made by the police the procession laid down their musical instruments and dispersed. It was held that the two leaders of the procession were guilty under this section.⁸

P R A C T I C E .

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the assembly was composed of five or more persons.

(2) That such assembly was likely to cause a disturbance of the peace.

It is not sufficient to establish, on a charge under this section, merely that in the opinion of the Magistrate the particular assembly was likely to cause such a disturbance; it is necessary to establish to the satisfaction of the Court that the assembly was in fact likely to cause it.⁹ The opinion of the police-officer dispersing it is admissible.¹⁰

(3) That such assembly had been commanded to disperse.

(4) That such command was lawful.

(5) That the accused joined, or continued in, such assembly, after it had been so commanded to disperse.

(6) That the accused did so knowingly.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, joined (or continued in) an assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, after knowing that such assembly had been lawfully commanded to disperse, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 151 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

152. Whoever assaults¹ or threatens to assault, or obstructs or attempts to obstruct, any public servant² in the discharge of his duty as such public servant, in endeavouring to disperse an unlawful assembly,³ or to suppress a riot⁴ or affray,⁵ or uses, or threatens, or attempts to use criminal force⁶ to such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years or with fine, or with both.

Assaulting or obstructing public servant when suppressing riot, etc.

COMMENT.

The last section punished disobedience to the order of a public servant commanding an assembly to disperse; this section punishes more severely persons who assault a public servant endeavouring to disperse an unlawful assembly. This section is intended to prevent the use of force on a public servant in order to prevent him from discharging his duty.

1. 'Assault'.—See s. 351, infra.
2. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.
3. 'Unlawful assembly'.—See s. 141, supra.
4. 'Riot'.—See s. 146, supra.
5. 'Affray'.—See s. 159, infra.
6. 'Criminal force'.—See s. 350, infra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that an unlawful assembly was held.

(2) That an endeavour was being made to disperse it.

(3) That the person endeavouring so to disperse it was a public servant.

(4) That such public servant was then acting in the discharge of his duty as such public servant.

(5) That the accused assaulted, or threatened to assault, or obstructed or threatened to obstruct such public servant, whilst so discharging his duties, or that he used, or threatened to use, or attempted to use, criminal force to such public servant, whilst so discharging his duties.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

Charge.—This section contemplates an assault or obstruction to some particular public servant. Where, therefore, the charge against the accused as framed was merely to the effect that they assaulted and obstructed members of the police force in the discharge of their duties, etc., the conviction under this section was not upheld.¹¹

The charge should run thus:—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, assaulted (or threatened to assault, or used, or threatened to use, criminal force to)—, a public servant, in the discharge of his duty as such public servant in endeavouring to disperse an unlawful assembly (or to suppress a riot or affray) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 152 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

153. Whoever maliciously,¹ or wantonly,² by doing anything which is illegal,³ gives provocation to any person intending or knowing it to be likely that such provocation⁴ will cause the offence of rioting to be committed, shall, if the offence of rioting be committed in consequence of such provocation, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both; and if the offence of rioting be not committed, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section punishes a person who does illegal acts which provoke others to commit rioting but which do not amount to abetment.¹² It is divided into two parts. If rioting is committed the punishment is more severe.

1. 'Malignantly' implies a sort of general malice.¹³ According to Webster the adverbs 'maliciously' and 'malignantly' are synonymous. Malice is not, as in ordinary speech, only an expression of hatred and ill-will to an individual, but means an unlawful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse.¹⁴ Malignant means extreme malevolence or enmity; violently hostile or harmful. A riot took place between Hindus and Mussalmans. The excitement caused by the riot had not entirely subsided, when the accused composed and published a poem, giving an account of the outbreak, and incidentally extolling certain classes of the Hindu community, namely, the Ghatīs and Kamatis, for the brave resistance which they had offered to the Mahomedan rioters. The poem extolled the Ghatīs and Kamatis and then followed these lines :—

"May God give glory to you, confer joy on you night and day, Fight again for your country's good".

The poem was written in Gujarati, a language not ordinarily spoken by the Ghatīs and Kamatis or even by the Mahomedans. It did not appear that any copies of the work were distributed among the people who had taken part in the riot. Nor did any fresh riot take place subsequently to the publication of the work. The accused were prosecuted and convicted under s. 117 and this section, on the ground that the lines quoted above, especially the words "Fight again", were a direct instigation to the Ghatīs and Kamatis to renew the disturbances. It was held that the meaning of the passage complained of was to be gathered from the whole poem. The general spirit of the poem was clearly in favour of peace and reconciliation. It consisted from beginning to end of a lamentation over the riots, and the destruction and death they had caused, and of repeated counsel to peace and harmony between Hindus and Mahomedans. And there was nothing to indicate that the author's intention was to instigate the Hindus or provoke the Mahomedans to renew the disturbances. The words "Fight again" were, no doubt, objectionable, but it would not be a proper construction of the words to allow them to override the whole context of the work.¹⁵

2. 'Wantonly' means recklessly,¹⁶ thoughtlessly, without regard for right or consequences. This word gives to the offence contained in this section a far larger, vaguer, and more comprehensive scope, than would be implied by the word 'malignantly' standing alone. It occurs in this section, while the word 'malignantly' occurs once again in s. 270.

Where certain persons taking part in a religious procession gratuitously disobeyed the orders of the police concerning the manner in which such procession was to be conducted, with the result that a riot was only averted by bringing armed police upon the scene, it was held that the persons concerned acted 'wantonly' within the meaning of this section.¹⁷ Similarly, where certain Mahomedans formed themselves into a procession, and proceeded along a certain route, and disobeyed the orders of the police and came into contact with a procession of Hindus, and a riot resulted, it was held that they were guilty of an offence under this section as they refused to comply with the orders of the police.¹⁸

3. 'Illegal'.—An offence under this section requires that the offender should do something illegal by doing which he malignantly or wantonly gives provocation to any person intending or knowing it to be likely that a riot would be the result.¹⁹ As to the meaning of 'illegal', see s. 43, supra. A Mussalman procession passed by the door-way of the accused, outside which he had, without any permission, erected a screen and inside which was an image of the goddess Bhawani. The accused was asked to close the door or to put up a screen for a few minutes while the procession passed by, and he refused to do so. The Magistrate convicted the accused on the ground that "by this illegal omission of respect to the religious feelings of the Mussalmans, he provoked a riot". It was held that the conviction was wrong.²⁰ Where a priest left the temple at midnight leaving it in charge of a third person and then deliberately threw bricks at the temple hoping that the Hindus, believing that the bricks came from the Mahomedan quarter, would be enraged against the Mahomedans and there would be a riot between the Hindus and the Mahomedans, but nobody was hurt, it was held that the priest could not be convicted under s. 334, his act being neither rash nor negligent but deliberate, nor under this section as it could not be said that his act was illegal, the throwing of a brick at a temple not being prohibited by law.²¹ A bride and bridegroom of the depressed class were about to be carried in palanquins through a village, and objections were raised by the high caste Hindus of the village that depressed class people were never permitted to ride in palanquins through the village, that the palanquin should be carried empty and the bride and bridegroom should walk. There was a local practice against depressed classes riding in palanquins through the village. The Circle Inspector of Police who had been directed to be present apprehending a possible breach of the peace, intervened and ordered that the palanquins should be carried empty. Certain persons, in disobedience of this order, put the bride and the bridegroom into the palanquins and had them carried through the village. These persons were thereupon convicted under this section. It was held that the conviction was bad, as the accused had not done anything which was illegal; riding in palanquins through a village was not an act illegal in itself, nor had any civil Court held that there was any village custom having the force of law which prevented people of depressed classes from doing so in the village, and which the accused could be said to have transgressed. Disobedience of the Circle Inspector's order was not an illegal act, as he had no authority to issue the order.²²

4. 'Gives provocation to any person, etc.'—The provocation should have been given with the intention or knowledge that it is likely to cause rioting. Where a Mahomedan killed a cow not in the presence of any Hindu, but the Hindus came to know of it subsequently, it was held that no offence was committed under this section although the religious feelings of the Hindus were hurt on hearing of it. The act of killing the cow not having been done in the presence of any Hindu whose feelings would be wounded it would not amount to 'giving provocation' if on subsequently hearing of the act the religious feelings of certain Hindus were hurt.²³ Where the natural and probable effect of reading a pamphlet was to give provocation to the followers of the Head Priest of the Dawoodi Bohra community, it was held that the writer of the pamphlet might properly be said to have intended that such provocation would cause rioting and that he was therefore guilty of an offence under this section.²⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused did an act which was illegal.

(2) That he did so malignantly or wantonly.

Very strong evidence is necessary to prove this.²⁵

(3) That the illegal act was the cause of provocation.

(4) That the accused, when giving such provocation, intended or knew that it was likely that such provocation would cause a riot to be committed. Prove also whether the riot was or was not committed in consequence of such provocation.

If the riot was not committed the accused would be liable under the first clause ; if it was, then the offence would be punished under the second clause.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant (if riot be committed), otherwise, summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Any Magistrate—Triable summarily, if riot be not committed.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc..) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, malignantly (or wantonly) by doing——which was illegal, gave provocation to——, intending (or knowing it to be likely) that such provocation would cause the offence of rioting to be committed, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 153 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

153A. Whoever by words, either spoken or written, or by signs, or by visible representations, or otherwise, promotes¹ or attempts to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes² of Her Majesty's subjects, shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.—It does not amount to an offence within the meaning of this section to point out, without malicious intention and with an honest view to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce, feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects.

COMMENT.

This section was added by Act IV of 1898, s. 5. It is extremely wide though controlled by the explanation. It supplements the law of sedition enacted in s. 124A.

When the Bill to amend s. 124A was introduced the Legislature thought of putting the words "promotes or attempts to promote feelings of enmity or ill-will between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects," as a clause in the proposed s. 124A. But the Select Committee omitted this clause and introduced the present section on the following grounds: "It appears to us that the offence of stirring up class-hatred differs in many important respects from the offence of sedition against the State. It comes more appropriately in the Chapter relating to offences against the public tranquillity. The offence only affects the Government or the State indirectly, and the essence of the offence is that it predisposes classes of the people to action which may disturb the public tranquillity. The fact that this offence is punishable in England as seditious libel is probably due to historical causes, and has nothing to do with logical arrangement".¹

Principle.—The section means that no subject of the Crown is entitled to write or say or do anything whereby the feelings of one class of His Majesty's subjects will be inflamed against another class of his subjects.²

Scope.—It is unnecessary, under this section, as in s. 124A, to establish the success of an attempt. A man cannot escape from the consequences of uttering words, with intent to promote feelings mentioned in the section, solely because the person to whom they are addressed may be too wise or too temperate to be influenced by them.

In a much criticised Lahore case (known as the Rangila Rasul case) Dalip Singh, J., held that this section was intended to prevent persons from making attacks on a particular community and was not meant to stop polemics against deceased religious leaders (like Prophet Mahomed) however scurrilous and in bad taste such attacks might be.³ This view was not approved of in a subsequent case (known as Risala-i-Vartman case) tried before a Special Bench of the Lahore High Court, though there is no reference to the former case in the judgment. In the latter case also the article was a disguised satire on certain incidents in the life of Prophet Mahomed and was in extremely bad taste and scurrilous in nature.⁴ A Hindu who ridicules a prophet of the Mahomedans not out of any eccentricity but in the prosecution of a propaganda started by a class of persons who are not Mahomedans, promotes feelings of enmity and hatred between Hindus and Mahomedans, and is liable to punishment under this section.⁵

Intention.—The Allahabad High Court has held that the intention to promote hatred or enmity between different classes is not a necessary ingredient of the offence under this section. Even if a question of intention could arise, such intention must be gathered from the words used, and they themselves would be conclusive, and it would not be necessary for the prosecution further to prove that such an intention was behind the use of such words.⁶ If the language of a writing is of a nature calculated to produce or to promote feelings of enmity or hatred, the writer must be presumed to intend that which his act was likely to produce.⁷ The Chief Court of Oudh has held that the gist of the offence is the intention to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of people. The Court must be satisfied that the accused had a conscious intention of promoting, causing or exciting, enmity and hatred between various classes.⁸ The same is the view of the Patna High Court,⁹ and of the Chief Court of Sind.¹⁰

Feelings of enmity and hatred should be aroused between two 'classes' of His Majesty's subjects, that is to say, between two sections of the people which can be classified as two well defined groups opposed to each other. A vague, indefinite and nameless body, even though given one name, may not in certain circumstances be considered as a class by itself, particularly if individuals overlap indiscriminately. At the same time, however, it is not necessary that the classes should be so distinct and separate as to make it always easy to put an individual in one class or the other.¹¹ Similarly, the Calcutta High Court has held that the essence of the offence is malicious intention. If there is no malicious intention in the publication, honesty of purpose may be inferred.¹² The Bombay High Court has also held that it is necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused had the intention, in acting as he did, to promote enmity between the Hindu and Moslem communities. His intention may be gathered from the words themselves or may be proved by evidence dehors those words. Equally, it is not incumbent on the prosecution to prove that his attempt to promote discord was successful provided he had the intent. Nor is it a good defence that the accused's action was prompted by a desire to protect himself and his community from violence although that is an element which may be taken into consideration in assessing his punishment.¹³

The intention of the writer must be gathered from the article as a whole, and a person cannot, therefore, be convicted under this section where the article does not show any such intention as is referred to in the section even though isolated portions of the article may, taken by themselves, fall within the section. A writer cannot be convicted of an offence under this section where it is possible that he may have, without any malicious intention and honestly, though wrongly in the opinion of the Court, thought that he should express himself in the manner in which he did with a view to the removal of causes which according to him were promoting or had a tendency to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of His Majesty's subjects.¹⁴

The intention can be inferred from the effect the words, signs or other representations are likely to produce upon the class of persons to be affected by it. Intention can be deduced from the internal evidence of the words used by the writer. It is permissible to examine the general policy of the paper in which the article in question has appeared and also to take into consideration the persons for whom it was written and the state of feelings of the communities, between whom it is intended to promote feelings of enmity or hatred, at the time of the publication.¹⁵ Where the article complained of bears a meaning that it is calculated to produce hatred and enmity between two classes, the natural inference from the publication of such an article is that the person who published it had the malicious intention that it should produce such hatred and enmity. The burden of proof shifts to the accused when he asserts that the natural inference to be drawn from the publication of the article does not hold good in his case. It makes no difference that the accused is the editor of a newspaper.¹⁶

The preface to a book can be no guide with regard to the intention of an accused person. The intention has to be judged primarily by the language of the book and the circumstances in which the book was published. If the language is of a nature calculated to produce or to promote feelings of enmity or hatred the writer must be presumed to intend that which his act was likely to promote.¹⁷

1. 'Promotes'.—"The word 'promote' in Webster's Dictionary is said to mean to contribute to the growth, enlargement or prosperity of any process or thing that is in course; to forward; to further; to encourage; to advance; to excite, and also 'to urge on or incite another, as to strife'. A man may promote a thing without intending to do so, as a matter of fact it often happens that a man intending to promote one thing actually promotes the opposite, ex.gr., measures intended to prevent drunkenness often increase it. Free trade intended to promote the prosperity of the country may injure the country. It would therefore appear that apart from 'intention' not being mentioned in the section it forms no essential part of the meaning of the word 'promotion'.

"However from the conjunction of the words 'attempt to promote' with 'promote', I am disposed to think that it was intended by the framer of the section that intention should be an element in the offence,...It is not essential to the meaning of 'promotion' that the object arrived at should be effected. That I take to be one of the differences between 'promoting' and 'causing'. Cause implies effect. Promotion does not. The promotion may fail of its object, in this respect it may be a synonym for 'foment'. It is also not essential that promotion should be with reference to something already in existence. It would be possible to promote hatred where amity had previously existed.

"It is also obvious that enmity may be promoted as strongly, or more strongly, by stories that are true than by stories that are false".¹⁸

This section does not mean that any person who publishes words that have a tendency to promote class hatred can be convicted under it. The words "promotes or attempts to promote feelings of enmity" are to be read as connoting a successful or unsuccessful attempt to promote feelings of enmity. It must be the purpose or part of the purpose of the accused to promote such feelings and, if it is no part of his purpose, the mere circumstance that there may be a tendency is not sufficient. Whether or not the promoting of enmity is the intention, is to be collected, in most cases, from the internal evidence of the words themselves; but other evidence can also be looked at. They are decisive in all cases where the intention is expressly declared; also if the words used naturally, clearly and indubitably have such a tendency then it must be presumed that the publisher intended that which is the natural result of the words used. But the words used and their true meaning are never more than evidence of intention and it is the real intention of the accused that is the test. There is no such doctrine as 'constructive intention'.¹⁹

2. 'Classes'.—Feelings of enmity and hatred should be aroused between two 'classes' of His Majesty's subjects, that is to say, between two sections of the people which can be classified as two well defined groups opposed to each other. A vague, indefinite and nameless body, even though given one name, may not in certain circumstances be considered as a class by itself, particularly if individuals overlap indiscriminately. At the same time, however, it is not necessary that the classes should be so distinct and separate as to make it always easy to put an individual in one class or the other.²⁰ The "classes" contemplated must be not only clearly defined and separable but also numerous. A small and limited group of zamindars cannot be regarded as constituting a class;²¹ nor do landlords or moneylenders.²² The classes referred to are mutually exclusive. To bring any body of persons within the description of a "class" of His Majesty's subjects, the body of persons must possess a certain degree of importance numerically, and must be ascertained with certainty and distinguished from any other class. Every group of persons cannot be designated as a class.²³

The word 'classes' includes religious denominations.²⁴ Any definite and ascertainable class of His Majesty's subjects will come within the section, although the classes may not be divided on racial or religious grounds. 'Capitalists' is too vague a phrase to denote a definite and ascertainable class so as to come within this section.²⁵ A limited company, or its share-holders as distinct from its employees cannot be designated as a "class or classes of His Majesty's subjects."²¹ The words used must point to a well-defined and readily ascertainable group having some element of permanence and stability and sufficiently numerous and widespread to be designated a class,² e.g., Europeans and Indians,³ Hindus and Mahomedans,⁴ Kisans and Zemindars⁵ or landowners,⁶ workmen and mill-owners.⁷

There must be a deliberate attempt to incite one class against another.⁸ An attack in a speech upon certain policemen at a particular place which does not convey a reflection upon the governing authority does not constitute an offence under this section as the police officials do not constitute a class.⁹ An attack upon a school of opinion does not necessarily involve an imputation upon the class who hold or give effect to that opinion. But one is apt to lead to the other.¹⁰

An attack on the policy of the Government is not necessarily an attack on the British people.¹¹

3. Explanation.—The Explanation does not enlarge the provisions of the substantive section. In this explanation we have what the Judicial Committee (in *Besant v. Advocate-General of Madras*¹²) has called "a delicate balancing of two important public considerations" and further that "In applying these balancing principles it is inevitable that different minds may come to different results, one mind attaching more weight to the consideration of freedom of argument, and the other to the preservation of law and order or of harmony."¹³ The section is never intended to apply to the case of the honest agitator, whose primary object is to secure redress of certain wrongs, real or fancied, and who is not actuated by the base mentality of a mere mischief-monger.¹⁴

It requires honesty and absence of malicious intention. A person who published as true a detailed account of a brutal murder of an Indian by a European based in fact on a mere rumour which had died out years before the publication and to the revival of which he himself had largely contributed, was held to be not protected from criminal liability by the explanation.¹⁵

Where the writer of an article inveighed both against the Babus and Meahs as professing brotherhood with the poor Mahomedan ryots and then robbing them, and referred to the alleged conduct of Christian Missionaries towards their converts, by way of illustration, without any deliberate attempt to excite one class against another, the conviction under this section was set aside as bad in law.¹⁶

Where the editor of a newspaper reproduces, in the ordinary way, as news, the contents of an inflammatory leaflet, inciting members of one community to violence against the members of another community, without intent to utilize the same to promote or further class hatred, but in circumstances which show a genuine intention to reprehend it and get it traced to its source and stopped, this section does not apply, although some readers of the paper may be thereby induced to entertain unreasonable feelings against the members of another class or community. Such a publication, where the intention was to bring it to the notice of the proper authorities, is covered by the explanation to the section.¹⁷

Where the writer of an article had complained in a sober language, free from exaggerations and incisive comments, for the consideration of public officers and others concerned with a view to their taking necessary action to prevent a repetition of what had previously taken place and the article contained no such statement, expression, or comment, as might fall within the purview of s. 505 or this section, it was held that he could not be convicted of an offence under this section.¹⁸

Where a drama was written at a time of great public excitement and the writer without any malicious intention and honestly thought that he should express himself in the manner in which he did with a view to the removal of causes which according to him were promoting or tending to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between Hindus and Mahomedans, it was held that as the writer was quite honest in the view which he took, though it might be a wrong one, he could not be held guilty under this section.¹⁹

An article purported to be a dream in which the writer (a Hindu) was borne to Heaven where he was given a mysterious animal to ride and on its back he visited Paradise and Hell. In the latter place he professed to have seen Prophet Mahomed surrounded by a large number of other historical Muslims and held certain conversations with them. The Prophet was depicted as being in Hell suffering extreme torture; around him were his wives and others similarly situated and in the same state of suffering. The article dealt with the Prophet not as an individual but as the founder of Islam, and attempted to emphasize the futility of the Prophet's claims as the 'Intercessor' for his followers. It was held that to depict the founder of Islam with his wives and numerous followers in Hell undergoing the tortures of the damned was bound to inflame the minds of Mahomedans in general against the writer of the article and that class who rightly or wrongly were believed by them to be behind him; that a scurrilous, vituperative, and foul attack on a religion or on its founder would require a considerable amount of explanation to take it out of the substantive part of this section and bring it within the four corners of the explanation; and that the writer was guilty of an offence under this section.²⁰ The liberty to criticise the religious belief of others does not include a license to resort to vile and abusive language. The license of a missionary to advocate his own religion and to denounce other religions is not unlimited. Holding up to obloquy and derision a religious belief would amount to stirring up resentment and hatred on the part of those who accept it as their creed.

There is no distinction between an attack upon a system of religion in the abstract and one upon the people who believe in it.²¹ Where the ethnical origin of a community is sought to be traced by the author of a book, then so long as there is adherence to the historical part of the narrative, however unpalatable it may be to the members of that community, or so long as he is merely relying on certain customs, habits and practices prevailing among that community, there may be no offence under this section. But, on the other hand, where the author uses language which shows malice and attributes to the entire community certain immoral practices and habits, and there is generalisation of offensive remarks on the basis of a few instances and the characterisation of an entire community as possessing certain vices, so as to degrade the members of that community in the eyes of the other classes, the case certainly amounts to promoting feelings of hatred or enmity between classes.²²

The accused, a social worker, at a meeting of about six hundred labourers held on the May Day celebration, in moving a resolution expressing the solidarity of the working class and its determination to fight and destroy the capitalist system and to organize mass resistance in the form of general strike with a view to fight the offensive of retrenchment and wage-cut launched by capitalists, made a speech in which she urged upon the labourers to unite in order to fight their two enemies, viz., Government and capitalists "who are sucking the blood of the labourers", and eulogised the effects of a general strike. She pointed out that Government and capitalists had weapons, but labour was a stronger weapon; that the rule (raj) of labour should be established by the union of all labourers; and that everything was in the hands of labour who wanted to break the powers of capitalists and imperialists. The speaker emphasised that Government were getting afraid of labour, and that while Congress leaders were sentenced to short terms of imprisonment, the leaders of labour were sent to jail for long terms. She ended by exhorting all labour to unite for destroying the capitalist system. It was held that the accused had committed no offence punishable under this section, inasmuch as the speech was not strong enough to promote or attempt to promote feelings of enmity or hatred against the capitalists, apart from the fact whether they constituted or not a class within the meaning of the section.²³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused promoted or attempted to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of His Majesty's subjects.

It is relevant to show the intention of the accused in writing the pamphlet complained of, and also to prove that the allegations contained therein are based on facts as distinguished from rumour. Evidence to show that the contents of the pamphlet are true or believed by the accused to be true would be relevant also on the question of the sentence to be passed in the event of conviction.²⁴

A person who is found on one occasion only circulating notices which may have the effect of promoting enmity between classes may be prosecuted under this section, but he cannot be proceeded against under s. 108, Criminal Procedure Code.²⁵

(2) That he did so by words, or by signs, or by visible representations or otherwise.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Sanction.—No Court shall take cognizance of this offence unless upon complaint made by order of, or under authority from, the Provincial Government or some officer empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf.¹

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, by speaking (or writing) the words—(or by signs, or visible representations), viz.—promoted (or attempted to promote) feelings of enmity (or hatred) between (specify the classes) of His Majesty's subjects and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 153A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

Punishment.—The test as regards sentence should be whether the speech of the accused was a violent one and whether the intention of the accused was to excite people to commit violence. To exhort people of an important body like the Union of the East Indian Railway and to bring in the examples of Soviet Russia and Ireland to run down the Zemindars and Talukdars of Oudh were very serious offences and deserved a severe sentence.²

154. Whenever any unlawful assembly¹ or riot² takes place, the owner or occupier of the land upon which such unlawful assembly is held, or such riot is committed, and any person having or claiming an interest in such land,³ shall be punishable with fine not exceeding one thousand rupees, if he or his agent or manager,⁴ knowing that such offence is being or has been committed,⁵ or having reason to believe⁶ it is likely to be committed, do not give the earliest notice thereof in his or their power to the principal officer at the nearest police-station, and do not, in the case of his or their having reason to believe that it was about to be committed, use all lawful means in his or their power to prevent it and, in the event of its taking place, do not use all lawful means in his or their power to disperse or suppress the riot or unlawful assembly.

Owner or occupier of land on which an unlawful assembly is held.

COMMENT.

The section declares in the first place that the owner of the land, on which a riot or unlawful assembly is committed or held, becomes punishable, if he or his agent or manager knowing that such offence is being committed or has been committed or having reason to believe that it is likely to be committed, does not give the earliest notice thereof in his or their power at the nearest police station. (It will be observed that this portion of the section is extremely comprehensive in character, and embraces not only the past and present, but also the future). The second provision makes it punishable on the part of the owner or his agent or manager, if he or they, 'having reason to believe that a riot was about to be committed', do not use all lawful means in his or their power to prevent it. The third imposes the same penalty, if in the event of a riot taking place he or they do not use all lawful means in his or their power to disperse or suppress the riot or unlawful assembly.³

The section contemplates three different breaches of duty :

- (1) Omission to give notice of a riot or unlawful assembly;
- (2) Abstention from preventing it; and
- (3) Negligence to suppress it.

Many duties of the police are by law imposed on landholders. The present section proceeds apparently upon a presumption that, in addition to any such duty, the owner or occupier of land is cognizant in a peculiar way of the designs of those who assemble on his land, and is able not only to give the police notice, but also to prevent and to disperse and suppress the assembly.⁴ Under s. 45 of the Criminal Procedure Code village headmen, accountants, landholders and others are bound to report certain matters to the nearest Magistrate or to the officer in charge of the nearest police-station.

1. 'Unlawful assembly.'—See s. 141, supra. 2. 'Riot'.—See s. 146, supra.

3. 'An interest in...land' means any fragment of the ownership. The section would therefore apply to tenants and mortgagees, remaindermen and reversioners; but not to one merely entitled to a charge on land or to an easement.⁵

⁵ Stokes, Vol. 1, p. 146.

It is impossible to punish in every case every person who has any interest in the land. The responsibility depends on the fact of the person who caused the riot being himself the person who has an interest in the land, or an agent or a manager of such person, and one of the facts to be proved is whose agent or manager the person fomenting the riot is.

4. 'Agent or manager.'—The criminal liability of a person for the acts and omissions of an agent or manager depends upon the question by whom the latter was appointed. Where, therefore, it was shown that three Hindu pardanashin ladies had the management of the estate and were responsible for the appointment of the agent who had fomented the riot, and that their adopted sons had nothing to do with such appointment, though they took some share in the active management of the estate, it was held that the ladies were alone liable.⁶ The accused was the sole proprietor of a village. A serious riot involving loss of life took place at that village, and the accused's agent instead of doing anything to prevent or suppress the riot accompanied the rioters and stood close by, while the riot was going on, after which he absconded. The accused, who had no knowledge that a riot was likely to be committed, was convicted under this section and fined. It was held that the landlord was liable under this section for the acts of commission as well as omission not only of himself, but of his agent or manager.⁷

5. 'Knowing that such offence, etc.'—The Allahabad High Court has ruled that it is not necessary, in order to render the owner of land on which a riot takes place criminally liable, that he should be aware of the likelihood of such an occurrence. That his manager should have taken an active part in the riot is sufficient to warrant the conviction of the owner under this section.⁸ Similarly, the Calcutta High Court has decided that knowledge, on the part of the owner or occupier of the land, of the acts or intentions of the agent, is not an essential element of an offence under this section, and he may be convicted under it though he may be in entire ignorance of the acts of his agent or manager.⁹

The owner or occupier of land on which an unlawful assembly is held cannot be convicted under this section unless there is a finding that the riot was premeditated.¹⁰

6. 'Reason to believe.'—See s. 26, supra.

Co-sharer.—A non-resident partner who has taken no active part in the management of the estate cannot, like a resident sharer, be convicted under this section.¹¹

No delay in prosecution.—Prosecutions under this and the following sections should be instituted without delay, having regard to the object of the law laid down in these sections which is to impress upon landholders their responsibilities and obligations in respect of riots or unlawful assemblies committed under the circumstances mentioned in these sections and thus serve as wholesome warnings not only to the persons concerned but also to others.¹²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that a riot took place.

(2) That the land upon which it was committed was owned or occupied by the accused; or that the accused had, or claimed, an interest in the land upon which it was committed.

(3) That the accused (or his agent or manager) knew that it was being, or had been, committed; or had reason to believe that such riot was likely to be committed.

(4) That the accused (or his agent or manager) omitted to give the earliest notice in his power to the principal officer at the nearest police-station.

(5) That the accused (or his agent or manager) omitted to use all lawful means in his power to prevent such riot, or to suppress it if it had taken place.¹³

Evidence taken in another case to which the accused were not parties was held inadmissible to convict them under this section. The records of another case would not of themselves be legal evidence for conviction.¹⁴

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class.

155. Whenever a riot is committed for the benefit or on behalf of any person who is the owner or occupier of any land respecting which such riot takes place or who claims any interest in such land, or in the subject of any dispute which gave rise to the riot, or who has accepted or derived any benefit therefrom, such person shall be punishable with fine, if he or his agent or manager, having reason to believe that such riot was likely to be committed or that the unlawful assembly by which such riot was committed was likely to be held, shall not respectively use all lawful means in his or their power to prevent such assembly or riot from taking place, and for suppressing and dispersing the same.

COMMENT.

Under the preceding section the owner of land is punishable for the taking place of an unlawful assembly or riot on his land. This section requires that the unlawful assembly or riot should take place in the interest of the owner or any person claiming interest in the land. The section, therefore, imposes unlimited fine. The preceding section referred to an unlawful assembly as well as a riot : this section refers to riot only.

The principle on which this and the following sections proceed is to subject to fine all persons in whose interest an affray is committed and the agents of such persons, unless it can be shown that they did what they lawfully could do to prevent the offence.

A zemindar ought not to be made liable under this section for a sudden and unpremeditated riot which there was no reason to infer he could have anticipated, or thought likely to happen.¹⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the riot was committed.

(2) That it took place with respect to some land, or that it arose out of some dispute.

(3) That the accused was the owner or occupier of such land, or claimed an interest therein, or claimed some interest in the subject of such dispute.

No conviction could be made unless it is shown that the accused had property in the land.¹⁶

(4) That such riot was committed for the benefit or on behalf of the accused, or that the accused accepted or derived some benefit therefrom.

(5) That the accused or his agent or manager had reason to believe (a) that such riot was likely to be committed; or (b) that the unlawful assembly, which committed such riot, was likely to be held.

(6) That the accused, his agent, or manager did not respectively use all lawful means, etc., (a) to prevent such assembly or riot from taking place; or (b) for suppressing and dispersing the same.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Summary trial.

Where there is no evidence to show that an absentee co-sharer in a zemindary takes an active part in the management, and a resident co-sharer has been sentenced to pay a fine under s. 155, the non-resident zemindar ought not to be convicted under this section.¹⁷

156. Whenever a riot is committed for the benefit or on behalf of any person who is the owner or occupier of any land respecting which such riot takes place, or who claims any interest in such land, or in the subject of any dispute which gave rise to the riot, or who has accepted or derived any benefit therefrom,

Liability of agent of owner or occupier for whose benefit riot is committed.

the agent or manager of such person shall be punishable with fine, if such agent or manager, having reason to believe that such riot was likely to be committed, or that the unlawful assembly by which such riot was committed was likely to be held, shall not use all lawful means in his power to prevent such riot or assembly from taking place and for suppressing and dispersing the same.

COMMENT.

The last section punished the owner of land or any person claiming an interest in it; this section punishes the agent or manager of such person.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—For points necessary to be proved, see s. 155. See also Brae's case,¹⁸ which lays down that to constitute an offence under this section it must be shown by legal evidence (1) that a riot was committed; (2) that the riot, if committed, was committed for the benefit of the accused; and (3) that the accused had reason to believe that a riot was likely to be committed.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Triable summarily.

157. Whoever harbours, receives or assembles, in any house or premises in his occupation or charge, or under his control any persons, knowing that such persons have been hired, engaged or employed, or are about to be hired,¹ engaged or employed, to join or become members of an unlawful assembly, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Harbouring persons hired for an unlawful assembly.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section, as compared with s. 150, is of a wider application. It provides for an occurrence that may happen and makes the harbouring, receiving or assembling, of persons who are likely to be engaged in any unlawful assembly, an offence. It contemplates the imminence of an unlawful assembly and the proof of facts which in law would go to constitute an unlawful assembly.¹⁹ It refers to some unlawful assembly in the future and provides for an occurrence which may happen, not which has happened. An act of harbouring a person, with the knowledge that, in some time past, he had joined or was likely to have been a member of an unlawful assembly, is not an offence under this section.²⁰

1. 'Hired, etc., or about to be hired, etc.'—Under this section it must be proved that the persons were hired or about to be hired for the purposes specified therein. It is not sufficient to show that some of the accused's servants have been taken from a district where men bear a well-known character as lathials (men with clubs) and had been in his service some time before the riot.²¹

Where certain salt satyagrahis trying to make contraband salt stopped at the accused's vacant hotel and the accused was convicted under this section for harbouring those persons, it was held that though there was no doubt that the accused harboured the satyagrahis, yet the conviction could not stand, as for a conviction under this section, it must be shown that they were hired, engaged or employed and of that there was no evidence.²²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the house or premises in question was or were in the occupation or charge of, or under the control of, the accused.

(2) That the accused harboured, received, or assembled therein the persons in question.

(3) That such persons had been hired, engaged, or employed, or were about to become so, to join or become members of an unlawful assembly.

(4) That when the accused did as in (2) he knew that such persons had been so hired, etc., for that purpose.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Summary trial.

ed, or engages or offers to go armed, with any deadly weapon¹ or with anything which used as a weapon of offence is likely to cause death, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with five, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section is intended to punish those persons who hire themselves out as members of an unlawful assembly or assist any such members. It is divided into two parts. Higher penalty is awarded where the accused is armed with a deadly weapon.

1. 'Deadly weapon.'—Such as, fire-arms, swords, etc. Whether a particular thing is a deadly weapon or not is a question of fact depending upon the special circumstances of each case.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the engagement or hiring of the accused; or the offer or attempt by the accused to become so.

(2) That the object of such engagement or hiring was to do, or assist in doing, an act which would make an assembly an unlawful one (see s. 141).

Prove also (for the last part of the section) whether the accused went or offered to go armed with a deadly weapon.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons (if the case comes under the first clause)—Warrant (if it falls in the second)—Bailable—Not compoundable—Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Triable summarily under the first clause of the section.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, engaged or hired (or offered or attempted to be hired or engaged) to do or assist in doing (here specify the act which amounts to an offence under s. 141) and went armed (or offered to go armed) with a deadly weapon (or with—which used as a weapon of offence was likely to cause death), and thereby committed an offence under s. 158 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

Punishment for committing affray.

COMMENT.

The word ‘affray’ is derived from the French word effraier, to terrify, and that, in a legal sense, it is taken for a public offence to the terror of the people. From this definition it seems clearly to follow, that there may be an assault which will not amount to an affray; as where it happens in a private place, out of the hearing or seeing of any, except the parties concerned; in which case it cannot be said to be to the terror of the people.²³ No quarrelsome or threatening words whatsoever shall amount to an affray.²⁴ An affray is an offence against the public peace because it is committed in a public place and is likely to cause general alarm and disturbance.

Ingredients.—The section has three essentials :—

1. Fight between two or more persons.
2. Such fight must be in a public place.
3. The fight must disturb the public peace.

1. ‘Two or more persons’.—The fight must be between two or more persons.

2. ‘By fighting in a public place’.—“A public place is one where the public go, no matter whether they have a right to go or not...Many shows are exhibited to the public on private property, yet they are frequented by the public—the public go there”.²⁵ It is obvious that what is a public place may vary from time to time, and what the Court has to consider is, was a particular place at the time public?—a place where the public undoubtedly were.¹ Places like railway platforms, theatre halls, and open spaces resorted to by the public for purposes of recreation, amusements, etc., are public places. The place where the public are actually in the habit of going must be deemed to be public. An open field with no compound wall is a public place.²

The offence of affray postulates the commission of a definite assault or a breach of the peace, and mere quarrelling or abusing in a street without exchange of blows is not sufficient to attract the application of this section. Where two brothers were found quarrelling and abusing each other on a public road and a large crowd gathered and the traffic was temporarily stopped, but no actual fighting took place, it was held that no affray was committed.³ Where a quarrel arose between four persons stationed at the entrance of a temple for the purpose of collecting fees and three other persons who wished to enter the temple without previous payment of the fee demanded, it was held that this offence was committed.⁴ Where two persons met and after abuse came to blows and each struck the other down while others had also joined the fight and one of them died of the injuries received, but there was no evidence as to who the assailant was, it was held that this offence was committed.⁵ In a public place two persons attacked and overpowered another person, who merely defended himself. It was held that the two persons were rightly convicted of affray under this section, as there was a "fighting" in a public place, notwithstanding the fact that the third person only defended himself in exercise of his right of private defence.⁶ Where members of one party beat members of another party and the latter did not retaliate or make any attempt to retaliate, it cannot be said that there was fighting so as to constitute an affray, since fighting, which is one of the ingredients of the offence of affray, connotes necessarily a contest or struggle for mastery between two or more persons against one another. A struggle or contest necessarily implies that there are two sides each of which is trying to obtain the mastery so that unless there is some violence offered or threatened against one another there can be no fight but only an assault or beating.⁷

Public places.—an omnibus,⁸ a railway platform,⁹ a public urinal,¹⁰ a goods yard of a railway station,¹¹ an unfenced compound,¹² a place forming part of the compound of a Hindu temple,¹³ and harbour premises,¹⁴ are public places.

Not public places.—A private chabutra adjoining a public thoroughfare,¹⁵ a railway station and platform at a time when no train is due except a goods-train,¹⁶ and a private garden,¹⁷ are not public places.

3. 'Disturb the public peace'.—It is essential that there must be a disturbance of the public peace. The offence under this section postulates the commission of a definite assault or breach of the peace. Mere quarrelling in a street over money matters without exchange of blows is not sufficient.¹⁸

Affray and riot.—An affray differs from a riot. The former cannot be committed in a private place, and does not require five or more persons; the latter requires at least five persons, and can be committed in a private place.

Affray and assault.—An affray differs from an assault. The one must be committed in a public place; the other may take place anywhere. The former is regarded as an offence against the public peace; the latter, against the person of an individual. An affray is nothing more than an assault committed in a public place and in a conspicuous manner, and is so called because it affrighteth and maketh men afraid.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused and another person, or other persons, were fighting.

In an affray specific evidence as to the acts of each fighter cannot be expected; mere general evidence as to the accused taking part in it will be sufficient.¹⁹ The Court must be satisfied that each one of the accused took an active physical part in fighting.²⁰

(2) That such fight was in a public place.²¹

(3) That the fight disturbed the public peace.²²

A conviction under this section, on a prosecution initiated by the police, would be no bar to a subsequent trial under s. 323 on a complaint laid by the party injured.²³

Procedure—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

CHAPTER IX.

OF OFFENCES BY OR RELATING TO PUBLIC SERVANTS.

THIS Chapter deals with two classes of offences, of which one can be committed by public servants alone, and the other comprises offences which relate to public servants though they are not committed by them.

“Those offences which are common between public servants and other members of the community, we leave to the general provisions of the Code. If a public servant embezzles public money, we leave him to the ordinary law of criminal breach of trust. If he falsely pretends to have disbursed money for the public, and by this deception induces the Government to allow it in his accounts, we leave him to the ordinary law of cheating. If he produces forged vouchers to back this statement, we leave him to the ordinary law of forgery. We see no reason for punishing these offences more severely when the Government suffers by them than when private people suffer. A Government, indeed, which does not consider the sufferings of private individuals as its own is not only selfish but short-sighted in its selfishness. The revenue is drawn from the wealth of individuals, and every act of dishonest spoliation, which tends to render individuals insecure in the enjoyment of their wealth is really an injury to the revenue. On every account, therefore, we think it desirable that the property of the state should, in general, be protected by exactly the same laws which are considered as sufficient for the protection of the property of the subject.”¹

The fact that transgression by a public servant may always be punished by dismissal from the public service explains the comparative leniency of some of the punishments provided by this Chapter and the absence of any notice of certain malpractices.

161. Whoever, being or expecting to be¹ a public servant,² accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept, or attempts to obtain³ from any person, for himself or for any other person,⁴ any gratification⁵ whatever, other than legal remuneration,⁶ as a motive or reward⁷ for doing or forbearing to do any official act⁸ or for showing or forbearing to show, in the exercise of his official functions, favour or disfavour to any person, or for rendering or attempting to render any service or disservice to any person,⁹ with the Central or any Provincial Government or Legislature, or with any public servant,¹⁰ as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanations.—“Expecting to be a public servant”. If a person not expecting to be in office obtains a gratification by deceiving others into a belief that he is about to be in office, and that he will then serve them, he may be guilty of cheating, but he is not guilty of the offence defined in this section.

“Gratification”. The word “gratification” is not restricted to pecuniary gratifications, or to gratifications estimable in money.

“Legal remuneration”. The words “legal remuneration” are not restricted to remuneration which a public servant can lawfully demand, but include all remuneration which he is permitted by the Government, which he serves, to accept.

“A motive or reward for doing”. A person who receives a gratification as a motive for doing what he does not intend to do, or as a reward for doing what he has not done, comes within these words.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A, a munsif, obtains from Z, a banker, a situation in Z's bank for A's brother, as a reward to A for deciding a cause in favour of Z. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(b) A, holding the office of Resident at the Court of a subsidiary Power, accepts a lakh of rupees from the Minister of that Power. It does not appear that A accepted this sum as a motive or reward for doing or forbearing to do any particular official act, or for rendering or attempting to render any particular service to that Power with the British Government. But it does appear that A accepted the sum as a motive or reward for generally showing favour in the exercise of his official functions to that Power. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(c) A, a public servant, induces Z erroneously to believe that A's influence with the Government has obtained a title for Z and thus induces Z to give A money as a reward for this service. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

COMMENT.

This section deals with the acceptance by a public servant of an illegal gratification or bribe “as a motive or reward for doing, or forbearing to do, any official act, or for showing, or forbearing to show, in the exercise of his official functions, favour or disfavour to any person.”²

Not only a public servant in esse but also one who expects to be a public servant in posse comes within the purview of this section.

Scope.—This section refers only to the taker and not to the giver of the bribe. The giver or offerer is brought under s. 116 by the doctrine of abetment.³

1. ‘Expecting to be’.—“If a person expecting to be appointed to a public office obtains money from another as the price of favour to be shewn to that other in the exercise of his functions in that office, he is surely as corrupt as one who does the same being actually in office. It must be proved of course that he gave the other party reason to believe that he was about to obtain the office, it must be proved also...that he himself expected to obtain it. In practice the provision would probably be brought into action only against persons who after having obtained the expected office are found guilty of the previous corrupt transactions, and generally only against persons who having obtained the expected office have acted officially in the corrupt manner previously promised”.⁴

2. ‘Public servant’.—A person who de facto, though wrongly, discharges the duties of an office through which he apparently figures as a public servant, may be tried for getting a bribe.⁵ See s. 21, supra, as to the definition of ‘public servant.’ A public servant who has gone on leave does not cease to be a public servant.⁶ The station-master of a State railway is a public servant within the meaning of this Chapter of the Code.⁷

3. ‘Obtains or agrees to accept, or attempts to obtain’.—The use of these words shows that solicitation by a public servant or other person was contemplated in framing the provisions of the Penal Code on the subject, and there is nothing in the Code to except from the definition of abetment the species of abetment involved in compliance with the corrupt wishes of the principal offender.⁸ A mere asking is sufficient to constitute an attempt.⁹

It is not necessary for the prosecution to show how the illegal gratification came to be demanded or obtained, so long as it can be clearly established by evidence that it was obtained.¹⁰

4. 'Any other person'.—The other person may or may not be a public servant, and therefore wholly unconnected with the official conduct.¹¹

5. 'Gratification' includes all gratifications of appetite and all honorary distinctions. Even where the payment paid is in the nature of dasturi in order to secure the Government contract, the payment comes within the mischief of this section.¹²

The words of the section exclude the defence that the benefit bargained for was to go to somebody else, and also the notion that an officer is protected if he agrees to let his official acts be swayed by the motive of accepting a gratification to be used for advancing some public not private object, such as, charity, science, or religion. The mahars of a village having been suspended from their office, a meeting of the villagers was held at the house of the village Patel, at which the Patel was present, to consider the question of their restoration to office, and an agreement was come to that they should be restored on their paying Rs. 300 towards the repair of a temple. It was held that the Patel being a public servant had committed this offence.¹³ Where a clerk whose duty was to place before his superior officer applications for gun licenses, informed an applicant for renewal of a license that the license would not be renewed unless he invested Rs. 100 in War Bonds, it was held that this amounted to an attempt to obtain a gratification within the meaning of this section.¹⁴

Cases.—A putwari who took grain as a consideration for showing favour to the giver in discharge of his functions as a putwari was held guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁵ The taking of a bribe by a head clerk to influence a Principal Sudder Ameen in his decisions was held sufficient for a legal conviction whether the head clerk did or did not influence or try to influence that officer.¹⁶ The kulkarni of a village told the ryots who had been given a grant of tagavi, that he had worked for them for eight days and that they must pay him twelve annas each or they would get into trouble, and in consequence thereof the ryots paid him the money. It was held that he had committed this offence.¹⁷ Where a Colonel of a regiment accepted from a firm of caterers sums of money paid to induce him to accept their representative as tenant of the regimental canteen, it was held that he was guilty of bribery.¹⁸ Where a constable and others entered into a house and apprehended certain persons as gamblers, and afterwards released them on payment of a sum of money by the latter, it was held that the offence committed was that of taking a bribe as regards the constable, and abetment of that offence as regards the others.¹⁹ Where a Subordinate Judge went in company with a litigant in his Court to a cloth shop and accepted a present of cloth which was paid for by the litigant to gain favours with the Judge in his suit, it was held that the Judge was guilty of an offence under this section.²⁰

6. 'Legal remuneration' means what is given to a public servant by the Government which he serves or by any person having authority from that Government to give,—or what is given to him by any person whosoever, if the Government permits him to accept the gift.²¹

The word "Government" in the definition of "legal remuneration" includes a Court of Wards,²² the Senate of the Allahabad University,²³ an employer of a railway servant,²⁴ a municipal board under the United Provinces Municipalities Act,²⁵ a Cantonment authority,¹ and a Municipality.²

7. 'A motive or reward'.—It is essential that a bribe should be obtained "as a motive or reward".³ This phrase evidently means "on the understanding that the bribe is given in consideration of some official act or conduct." Such an understanding need not be proved by explicit evidence of any precise agreement. It may be inferred from circumstances.⁴ A connection between the payment and the performance of the official duty must be established before it can be said that gratification offered was a motive or reward for purposes mentioned in the section.^{4a} A bribe is not the less a bribe because its payment is postponed.⁵ When a bribe has been given it is immaterial to inquire what effect, if any, the bribe had on the mind of the receiver.⁶

The explanation of this phrase as given in the section will not allow a public servant to justify his acceptance of a gift or bribe by urging that the order passed by him was nevertheless a just one and against the very person from whom he had received the bribe. Thus, it guards against such a plea as was set up as an excuse for Lord Bacon. "It is pretended", says Mr. Hume in his History, "that Bacon had, still in the seat of justice, preserved the integrity of a Judge, and had given just decrees against those very persons from whom he had received the wages of iniquity". It is an offence even when the act done for the bribe given is a just and proper one. The gist of the offence is a public servant taking gratification other than legal remuneration in respect of an official act.⁷

"The term 'reward' is manifestly intended to apply to a 'past service'. What is forbidden speaking generally is the receiving any gratification 'as a motive' to do, 'or a reward' for having done any such thing as is described in the definition".⁸

8. 'Official act'.—It must be an act or omission in connection with the official functions of the accused. Some village watchmen found a widow at the shop of a certain goldsmith at night, and the goldsmith gave them a reward to hold their tongues and to prevent them from being disgraced. It was held that they were not guilty of any offence.⁹ Because to keep silence on a private matter, which is in no way concerned with any matter of the police, much less of crime, and which the watchmen had no business to make the subject of official report, or mention to any person, is unconnected with the "doing or forbearing to do any official act", or with "showing or forbearing to show, in the exercise of their official functions, favour or disfavour to any person". Where two of the accused offered a gratification to a public servant in consideration of his not proceeding against them and the other accused, whose papers and books he had seized for bringing them to legal punishment, it was held that the offence committed did not fall under this section and s. 109, but under s. 214.¹⁰ Where the allegation made was that a Police Sub-Inspector helped a candidate for the Legislative Council as he got "silver tonic", it was held that this did not amount to a charge of bribery as contemplated as canvassing for votes at a council election was not an "official act".¹¹

The Allahabad, the Lahore and the Nagpur High Courts are of the opinion that it is sufficient if the accused thought that a particular public servant had an opportunity to show him favour in the exercise of his official functions,¹² or that a public servant had promised to show favour in the exercise of his official functions,¹³ although he might in reality have no such opportunity. The section does not require that the public servant must, in fact, be in a position to do the official act, favour or service at the time. Where the accused offered a bribe to an officer, mistaking him for the one whom he wanted to offer it, it was held that he was guilty of abetment of the offence under this section.¹⁴ The Madras and the Calcutta High Courts have held to the contrary. Where the charge against a karnam was that he received a bribe from a villager on the understanding that he would get him some darkhast land, the Madras High Court held that this did not constitute an offence under this section as getting a darkhast land was not the official act of a Karnam.¹⁵ It has also held that where a person, in the vain hope of getting a public officer to reconsider a question as to which that public officer is functus officio offers a bribe to him, he commits no offence by doing so and presumably the public officer would commit no offence by taking it.¹⁶ The accused, a taxi-driver, was prosecuted for an offence under the Motor Act. The case against him was dismissed. On the following day he was said to have offered Re. 1 to a police-officer as a bribe to withdraw the charge which the police-officer had brought against him. It was held by the Calcutta High Court that the accused could not be convicted of abetment of an offence under this section as it was not within the powers of the police-officer to show any favour to the accused who had already been discharged by the Magistrate and no money could have been paid to him as a motive or reward for doing anything for the accused.¹⁷

It is an offence even when the act to be done in return for the bribe is a just and proper act. It is not necessary to show that as a matter of fact favour was shown to the person who offered the bribe. It is sufficient if the person giving the gratification is led to believe that the official act would go against him if he did not give gratification.¹⁸

The performance of the act which is consideration for the bribe is not essential.

9. 'Rendering or attempting to render any service or disservice to any person'.—It is an offence if a public servant accepts any gratification as a motive or reward for rendering or attempting to render any service to any one with any public servant as such.¹⁹ Where the accused made an offer to the manager of a municipal office of a reward of Rs. 200 for using influence with the chairman and other councillors to get from them a contract for a third person, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.²⁰

10. 'With any public servant'.—The Federal Court of India has held that under the concluding words of this section a public servant may be guilty under that section even independently of the exercise of his official functions, for instance, where he obtains a reward for rendering or attempting to render any service to a person with another public servant.²¹

Accomplice.—The mere presence of a person on the occasion of the giving of a bribe, and his omission to promptly inform the authorities, do not constitute him an accomplice, unless it can be shown that he somehow co-operated in the payment of the bribe, or was instrumental in the negotiations for the payment.²²

Offer of bribe amounts to abetment.—A person offering a public servant an illegal gratification for any of the purposes stated in the section is liable for abetment of an offence under this section.²³ "The person who offers the bribe to a public servant is treated as the abettor of the offence created by section 161. If the bribe is accepted, the public servant is punishable under section 161 and the giver of the bribe under that section read with section 109. The case is put in Illustration (a) of the latter section. If the bribe is not accepted, the public servant commits no offence, but the person who offers the bribe is still punishable under section 161 read with section 116. The case is again put in Illustration (a) of section 116. In both cases the offence committed by the person who offers the bribe is according to the scheme of the Code an abetment of the offence described in section 161.²⁴

There is no rule of law or morality which warrants a discrimination in favour of the giver as distinguished from the taker of the illegal gratification.²⁵

A mere offer to pay an illegal gratification to a public servant, although no money or other consideration is actually produced, amounts to an attempt to bribe.¹ If a party offers a bribe to a judge, meaning to corrupt him in a case depending before him; and the judge taketh it not; yet this is an offence punishable by law, in the party that offers it.² To bribe or to attempt to bribe a public servant is only punishable under the Penal Code as an abetment of the substantive offence of a public servant accepting or attempting to obtain an illegal gratification. Illustration (a) to s. 116 is only an example of abetment of an offence under this section. There are many other ways of instigating a public servant to commit an offence under this section besides by means of a direct offer of a bribe.³ If a public servant allows illegal gratification to be delivered, but not in order to its acceptance, but merely for the purpose of having complete evidence of the transaction, the person offering the gratification will be punished for abetment under s. 116.⁴ A person offered a bribe to a Magistrate by thrusting currency notes into his hands. His defence was that he did so with a view to lay a trap as the Magistrate was known to be a corrupt official. It was held that his act amounted to abetment of the offence under this section.⁵ Even if a public servant is corrupt and solicits a bribe directly or indirectly, the giving him of a bribe is none the less an abetment of his offence.⁶ The distinction between an offer and an invitation for offers to be made is well recognised in the law of contracts, and there is no reason why in a criminal case the same distinction should not be observed, if the sole question is whether an offer has been made or not.⁷ The authors of the Code, however, say: "The person who, without any demand express or implied on the part of a public servant, volunteers an offer of a bribe, and induces that public servant to accept it, will be punishable under the general rule (law of abetment)...as an instigator. But the person who complies with a demand, however signified, on the part of a public servant, cannot be considered as guilty of instigating that public servant to receive a bribe. We do not propose that such a person shall be liable to any punishment...We are strongly of opinion that it would be unjust and cruel to punish the giving of a bribe in any case in which it could not be proved that the giver had really by his instigations corrupted the virtue of a public servant, who, unless temptation had been put in his way, would have acted uprightly".⁸

Where the accused offered Rs. 500 to a railway goods clerk deputed to assist the police in inquiring into frauds in the goods office, it was held that he was guilty of abetment.⁹ The accused took out ration cards in the names of his father and mother, who had already obtained separate ration cards for themselves, and when the matter was discovered he offered Rs. 25 to the Inspector to drop the case. The Inspector had already made a report to the Rationing Officer when the offer was made. It was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this section read with the first part of s. 116.¹⁰

Attempt.—To ask for a bribe is an attempt to obtain one, and a bribe may be asked for as effectually in implicit as in explicit terms.¹¹ B, who was employed as a clerk in the Pension Department, in an interview with A, who was an applicant for a pension, after referring to his own influence in that Department and instancing two cases in which by that influence increased pensions had been obtained, proceeded to intimate that anything might be effected by money and, on the overture being rejected, concluded by declaring that A would rue and repent the rejection of it. It was held that the offence of attempting to obtain a bribe was consummated.¹² Similarly, a demand of money by a Court peon from the plaintiff, as a motive or reward for serving summonses on his witnesses without an identifier, was held to be an attempt to obtain an illegal gratification.¹³ Amendment.—The words “Central or any Provincial Government or Legislature” were substituted for the words “Legislative or Executive Government of India, or with the Government of any Presidency, or with any Lieutenant-Governor” by the (Government of India (Adaption of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. In Burma, the words “Legislature or the Government” were substituted for the same words by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

CASE.

Abetment.—While a suit was pending before a Subordinate Judge, he was approached by one J who told him that the plaintiff would give him Rs. 10,000 if he would decree the suit. The Judge at once turned him out of the house. A few days later, one M, who was a pujari of the plaintiff, came to see the Judge at his house. The Judge had reason to suspect him to be an emissary of the plaintiff for the purpose of offering him a bribe; and with the intention of setting up a trap for the man the Judge himself suggested his willingness to take a bribe, and an amount and a date were settled. On the date fixed M and D, the son of the plaintiff, came with the money and handed it over to the Judge, whereupon they were caught by certain officers who had been concealed in the house by the Judge. J, D and M were put on their trial under this section read with s. 116. It was held that as J did not offer any bribe, nor was he or claimed to be an agent or representative of the plaintiff, his statement, or expression of opinion, that the plaintiff would be willing to offer a bribe did not amount to an abetment of the offence under this section, that D and M, the bribe-givers, were guilty of abetment of an offence under this section, although they only complied with a demand made by the public servant, and although the public servant had no guilty intention of receiving the money as a bribe.¹⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused at the time of the offence was, or expected to be, a public servant.

(2) That he accepted, or obtained, or agreed to accept, or attempted to obtain from some person a gratification.

(3) That such gratification was not a legal remuneration due to him.

(4) That he so accepted, etc., such gratification, as a motive or reward, for (a) doing, or forbearing to do an official act; or (b) showing, or forbearing to show favour or disfavour to some one in the exercise of his official functions; or (c) rendering, or attempting to render, any service or disservice to some one, with the Central or Provincial Government or Legislature, or with any public servant.

Conclusive evidence is required to establish a charge of bribery against a public servant or of his having committed an offence in the discharge of his public duties.¹⁵

The section does not require any particular criminal intention in the minds of the giver or receiver of the bribe.¹⁶

The Federal Court of India has laid down that a charge under this section is one which is easily and may often be lightly made, but is, in the nature of things, difficult to establish, as direct evidence in most cases is meagre and of a tainted nature. These considerations cannot however be suffered to relieve the prosecution of any part of the burden which rests upon it to establish the charge beyond reasonable doubt. If after everything that can legitimately be considered has been given its due weight, room still exists for taking the view that however strong the suspicion raised against the accused every reasonable possibility of innocence has not been excluded, he is entitled to an acquittal.¹⁷

Evidence as to general reputation admissible.—The accused was convicted of an offence under s. 500 of the Penal Code, for having defamed an Extra Assistant Commissioner by publishing an imputation that the latter had compelled him to pay a bribe in order to avoid a prosecution for a certain offence. The accused wanted to produce evidence as to the complainant having taken bribes on other occasions, and general evidence as to the complainant's reputation, but this was disallowed by the trial Court. It was held that evidence as to the complainant having taken bribes on other specific occasions would be irrelevant, but that the accused was entitled to produce evidence to show that the complainant had the reputation of being a bribe-taker.¹⁸

Evidence of previous and subsequent similar conduct is relevant to an issue of intention or other state of mind although it cannot be used to prove the commission of the crime.¹⁹

Evidence of accomplice.—Where the complainant did not willingly offer the bribe, but the accused, a police-officer, demanded it before taking up the charge lodged by the complainant and made use of his official position to enforce his demand, it was held that the circumstances were such as would justify a conviction on the testimony of accomplices with a much slighter degree of corroboration than would be the case if the accomplices were entirely voluntary accomplices.²⁰

The testimony of a bribe-giver must be corroborated in material particulars.²¹ Because his evidence is put on the footing of the evidence of an accomplice.²² Raising money for the purpose of giving a bribe and the merits of the case to decide which in favour of the bribe-giver a Judge accepts the illegal gratification are sufficient to corroborate the former who is really an accomplice.²³

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Made cognizable by Act II of 1947. Officer below the rank of Deputy Superintendent of Police cannot investigate it without the order of a first class Magistrate. But Bombay Act XXX of 1946, s. 3, makes the offence cognizable only. This Act is held to be applicable only to the city of Bombay.^{23(a)}

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is necessary for prosecution of Judges, Magistrates and public servants not removable from their office without the sanction of Government.²⁴ Thus, a District Munsiff cannot be prosecuted without a sanction;²⁵ but a Police Patel,¹ a Municipal Corporator,² and an Excise Inspector in the U. P.³ can be. If a Judge has not done an act in the capacity of a Judge no sanction is necessary.⁴ Where the alleged illegal gratification is an independent act committed by persons whose position gave them the opportunity to commit, but it is in no way bound up with the performance of their duties, no sanction is necessary.⁵ A Government officer accepting an illegal gratification for forbearing to do an official act is not "acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty" and no sanction is necessary for his prosecution.⁶

Joinder of charges.—Where a bribe was collected from certain inhabitants of a village by subscription and handed over to the recipient in a lump sum, it was held
